Having said that, I think we have to watch this very closely. There are obviously areas of influence. There is a temptation on the part of the Iranians to try to fund, you know, their own interests on this side of the border. But there are some checks and balances in the law, and I hope that they will be embodied in whatever constitution goes forward. And the final thing that I would say is that we need a vigorous involvement by Sunnis and we need a vigorous involvement by other Shia who are not in any way connected with Iran as well as the very strong involvement of the Kurds. So given the way this is playing out now, I think we should just withhold judgment as to what--who will emerge and what that will mean.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator McCain, speaking of Iran, Russian President Putin said yesterday that he is convinced Iran does not intend to build nuclear weapons. As you know, President Putin has also been responsible for some very undemocratic actions in his own country. What should President Bush say to President Putin on Thursday when they meet about Iran and about what's going on in Russia?

SEN. McCAIN: Well, I think he should say, "Vladimir, you made a serious foreign policy mistake in your handling of the Ukraine elections, and you're making another serious mistake as regards to Iran." The evidence is overwhelming that Iran, at least, has made enough steps towards acquiring a nuclear capability that we should all be concerned, and the evidence is very clear. And so I believe that Mr. Putin has got to understand that he is on the verge of isolating himself in many respects, whether it be in his war on Chechnya, whether his refusal to remove his bases from Georgia, his latest performance as far as Ukraine is concerned and now a mistake in foreign policy towards Iran--this Iranian situation. We should join together with Russia and stop the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction wherever they may be, including Iran's nuclear capability.

MR. RUSSERT: Should we begin to think about excluding Russia from the so-called G8, the gathering of industrialized nations?

SEN. McCAIN: Absolutely. I thought we should do that some time ago. And the damage that Mr. Putin is doing to his own economy, because he's going to discourage outside investment with his treatment of the Yukos thing, but he should be excluded from G8 because his behavior obviously, in my view, warrants at least temporary exclusion.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Clinton, how do you feel about the meeting between President Bush and President Putin this Thursday?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, Tim, I'm hopeful that the president will not just look into his soul but perhaps convey a very strong case against some of the moves that President Putin has been making. I really regret that because of the focus on Iraq, understandably so, it appears that we have taken our eye off the ball in a number of places around the world, and I would include Russia in that.

You know, I am not yet in favor of, you know, taking actions like excluding Russia from the G8. I think we need to have vigorous diplomatic engagement at this point. And the administration, at least to my view in trying to follow this, has not really been so engaged. At the end of such engagement, at the end of an effort to try to, you know, move President Putin back on the path to democracy and free market economies and other matters internally, as well as trying to speak out strongly and engage him on the basis of some of the interference in Ukraine and elsewhere, if that proves unsuccessful, then perhaps I would agree that we have to take some additional measures. But I first would like to see the president and the administration re-engage at the highest levels and be very vigorous in their diplomatic efforts with Russia.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator McCain and Senator Clinton, if Iran just refuses to stop development of their nuclear program, what do we do?

SEN. MCCAIN: I think we have to first convince our European allies of the magnitude of this threat and the necessity to take action. The Europeans, at least to a large degree, are only interested in carrots and no sticks. So we have to convince them of that. Then we have to go to the United Nations for diplomatic and economic sanctions if necessary.

We cannot rule out completely the military option if, if it's absolutely the absolute last resort, but there's a lot of things we can do in between time. Look, a nuclear-capable Iran in this part of the world is incredibly unsettling, including to the state of Israel. So it's a serious challenge, but I would exhaust every possible measure before considering the military option. But you cannot completely rule it out. First step, let's get united with the Europeans or have them unite with us as we go for sanctions if it's necessary.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Clinton, do you agree we cannot rule out a military option?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, Tim, I think, first of all, we do have to get engaged. I believe that the United States should be at the table and not just outsource this important negotiation to the Europeans. You know, I just have a fundamental disagreement, I guess, with the attitude of the administration with respect to a number of difficult areas. You know, I don't think it hurts us to be vigorously engaged, to be there, you know, conveying our point of view, to make sure we're aware of, you know, every possible option for both carrots and sticks. And I think with both Iran and North Korea, we've been missing.

Now, one can argue that that was a deliberate strategy by the administration because, you know, in the end of the day they're more interested in regime change than in anything short of that. I hope that's not the case. And one way they could disprove that suspicion is by becoming vigorously engaged with Great Britain, France and Germany, and also with Russia.

You know, what Putin said the other day was they were going to try to set up some system that would involve the control over the plutonium, and, you know, take spent fuel rods in and out of Iran. I don't know how realistic that is, but, you know, it would be very difficult for us to, you know, intervene and stop that or at least understand better whether it could be accomplished with appropriate safeguards when we're not involved.

So I would hope, first and foremost, that, you know, we get re-engaged. As important as Iraq is to our future in so many ways, I think we've seen that there are a number of other places around the world that can have a direct impact on our national security and, therefore, I would hope we would, you know, be able to really get to the table and see what we could do before there's any talk of anything else.

MR. RUSSERT: But you would not rule out a military option?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, Tim, I don't think that you either rule it in or rule it out. I think that, you know, depending upon circumstances, it's something that, you know, the American government would have to, you know, consider. But, for goodness sakes, I think we are a very long way from beginning to have that conversation, if we ever have to have it. But I don't believe in having any president of the United States or anybody, you know, in a position like Senator McCain and I in the United States Senate, you know, saying we would take anything off the table. But before we get to that question, let's try to, you know, deal with the many other possibilities.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn homeward on an issue that is very important to people watching this morning, and that is Social Security. Senator McCain, there's a big debate in your Republican Party about whether or not, as part of the solution to Social Security's solvency problem, that you lift the cap so that you would pay payroll tax, Social Security tax, not just on the first $90,000 of your income, but perhaps even higher. Could you support that as part of a compromise?

SEN. McCAIN: As part of a compromise I could, and other sacrifices, because we all know that it doesn't add up until we make some very serious and fundamental changes. I'm proud of the job that Senator Lindsey Graham has been doing in his leadership position on this issue and showing some courage.

Look, in 1983, we all know that Tip O'Neill and Ronald Reagan agreed, and Republicans and Democrats agreed. If you examine that agreement, it had to do with increasing the retirement age, increasing taxes; there was a lot of sacrifices that were made. But it was the only way to save it. So my answer is, if everything's on the table, certainly that should be something that's on the table because, according to polls I've seen, that's the one, the one thing that most Americans agree is probably a viable option, but not by itself but with other, with other changes that need to be made. And if we don't, then we might as well say, "Look, it's not going to change."

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Clinton, last week on this program, Congressman Charlie Rangel of New York said the president's plans for Social Security reform are dead. Do you agree?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, we don't know what the plan is yet, Tim. So it may be a little premature to make such an announcement. But until we know exactly what is being proposed, it's kind of a vacuum at the moment. So I'm waiting to see what the president proposes.

MR. RUSSERT: Before you go, you both had a chance to speak before the New Hampshire Chamber of Commerce this week. Why New Hampshire? Why did you choose to speak to the New Hampshire Chamber of Commerce?

SEN. McCAIN: You want to answer it first?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, Tim, I was--that's right. After you, Alfonse. I was asked to speak to the Portsmouth Chamber of Commerce, so it wasn't statewide, by our colleague, Senator Sununu. And I must rush to disabuse you, if there's anyone watching and thinking of a great big audience and drawing whatever conclusions one wishes. In a very small room in the Capitol, there were about eight or nine people sitting around a table, and we had a lovely discussion.

SEN. McCAIN: And my excuse is that John Sununu asked me to speak to them, and I was glad to do so. And I spent some time in Portsmouth in the year 2000, and I enjoyed their company. And by the way, one of their issues was the BRAC process as was to whether the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard would survive or not, and I did not assure them that was necessarily the case, although it's certainly a wonderful shipyard.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator McCain, a serious question: Do you think the lady to your right would make a good president?

SEN. CLINTON: Oh, we can't hear you, Tim. We can't hear you.

SEN. McCAIN: Yeah, you're breaking up. I am sure that Senator Clinton would make a good president. I happen to be a Republican and would support, obviously, a Republican nominee, but I have no doubt that Senator Clinton would make a good president.

MR. RUSSERT: Equal time, Senator Clinton. The gentleman to your left?

SEN. CLINTON: Absolutely.

MR. RUSSERT: We may have a fusion ticket right here.

SEN. McCAIN: Thanks for doing that to us. Thanks for doing that to us, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: A fusion ticket.

SEN. McCAIN: We're both in trouble.

SEN. CLINTON: Yeah. We're in trouble now. Thanks a lot.

SEN. McCAIN: We're both in trouble.

MR. RUSSERT: Be safe, everybody.

SEN. CLINTON: Thanks, Tim.

SEN. McCAIN: Thank you.

MR. RUSSERT: And coming next, our roundtable talks about the appointment of John Negroponte as the nation's first director of national intelligence, appointed by President Bush. And the world's hot spots: Iraq, Iran, North Korea and more, all coming up right here on MEET THE PRESS.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON MILITARY STRATEGY AND OPERATIONAL REQUIREMENTS FOR COMBATANT COMMANDERS, 3/1/2005

COMMITTEE: SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

And thank you, gentlemen.

General Abizaid, thank you for taking time out last week to meet with the CODEL that Senator McCain led, the first march through CENTCOM. And I appreciate all that you're doing and your sensitivity to these difficult political issues as well as the military ones.

I wanted to follow up on the direction that Senator Reed was heading with his questions.

I am concerned about what does develop with the new Iraqi government and I think, largely, it is out of our hands. From, you know, the experiences we had and the conversations that we engaged in, much of what will happen in the future depends upon the statesmanship and patriotism of whoever emerges as the head of this government.

And I know that there are a number of forces at work to influence how that government is established and what positions it might take.

And I was hoping, General, that you might enlighten us on your current assessment as to, you know, what role the neighbors are playing, particularly Iran, but not exclusively Iran, whether Syria, Turkey, are involved in the political side, because, to me, that's the most important dynamic that's occurring right now.

ABIZAID: It's a very difficult question.

First of all, thanks for coming out there. It was good to have you and the delegation out there.

The most frequently talked about difficulty for the emergence of a new government comes -- and it's really talked about more inside Iraq than it is anywhere else -- and it has to do with the degree to which Iran will exercise some sort of control over the new government.

ABIZAIID: And there's a lot of concern in the Sunni Arab community, in particular, that Iran is seeking to make Iraq a puppet state.

I know an awful lot of the people involved in this process of building a new Iraq, and I believe that they're Iraqi Arabs before they're anything else. And, yes, they're Shia; yes, they have been in the past friendly with Iran, but I do not believe that there is much of an impetus inside of Iraq for a Shia theocratic-style state to show up, like is evident in Iran.

I think it's very unlikely. I think they'll move toward something very Iraqi, very Arab, but also that, by necessity, must be very inclusive.

Now, the Iranians have played an unhelpful role. They played an unhelpful role with Muqtada al-Sadr. They continue to have significant intelligence activities inside of Iraq that are of concern, not only to us, but to everybody that believes in the sovereignty of Iraq.

So the most important message for the Iranians is that Iraq is a free and a sovereign nation that will develop its own future.

I think it's inevitable that Iran and Iraq will have a closer relationship, certainly, than they did back in the days of Saddam. But on the other hand, I believe that Iraq will be drawn more into the orbit of its Arab neighbors than Iran.

As far as Syria is concerned -- you know, there's another model that the Shia talk about, and that other model is what they would call a Salafist extremist state would emerge. And they say they would get this sort of support from a place like Syria.

I don't find that very likely. I don't think that the Syrians or anybody else in the region have any interest in an extremist, religious Sunni type of state to emerge whatsoever. This is the mantra of bin Laden's, Zawahiri, Zarqawi, et cetera, and it is very unlikely that there would ever be enough support for that to happen, although, we shouldn't underestimate their ability to intimidate people and to cause damage and to terrorize people toward that direction.

Syria also plays an unhelpful role in that. I think they're ultimately worried about what the United States will do in the region and their future. And so they think by continuing to stir the pot in Iraq, they will avoid whatever they think might be coming.

And really, again, the message to Syria is the same as to Iran: Help in the stability of Iraq, and you'll help your own peace and prosperity. It's a very, very simple equation.

The Turks look down to the south, and they're worried about a Kurdish state emerging. But the Kurds and the Shia and the Sunni of Iraq, they're no fools. They know they have to move together or the state will break up and their worst nightmare will come true.

And so, again, the message for Turkey, a good ally, is: The Kurds will move together within a sovereign Iraq with the Shia and the Sunni to build a new community.

Looking to Saudi Arabia, the Saudis are concerned. Continued instability in Iraq is a problem for Saudi Arabia.

It's a problem for Kuwait. It's a problem for all the smaller Gulf states. There is a school of thought that the insurgency in the Sunni Arab community will spawn additional terrorism to the south, especially in the Gulf and in Saudi Arabia, and it's a legitimate concern.

So the sooner the nations in the region control the movement of these extremist jihadists, the sooner we'll be able to control the pace of the insurgency in Iraq and achieve stability in the region.

Ultimately, as stability is achieved, obviously we bring down our force structure, because over time it's not to anybody's interest to continue to have a large American presence there.

We need to have a shield that helps the region move toward moderation and prosperity and peace; we don't need to have a domineering military presence there.

But until Iraq can be stabilized, Afghanistan can be stabilized, and Pakistan and Saudi Arabia have a chance to help themselves against extremists, we'll be there for a while.

CLINTON: Thank you, General.

General Jones, thank you, too, for your extraordinary leadership in Europe. I appreciated being with you at the Munich Secretary conference. And certainly, NATO's going through some challenging times, but your presence there is very important.

I wanted to ask you about Darfur, and I apologize if somebody has already asked you, because I couldn't get here any earlier.

When we were in Munich, one of the requests that is very clear, in the conversations I had, is that if there's any hope -- if we're going to have a deadlocked Security Council -- which I think, unfortunately is, at this moment, a fact and I regret it, and I think it has to do with China and Russia and oil and lots of other things that the Sudanese government is promising. And unless we're able to break that loose -- and I hope we're still trying -- then the African Union is basically down there inadequately prepared to deal with what we expect them to do.

And when talking with people who know about the situation of the African Union, a number of responded and said that what they need more than anything is just one transport plane. They just don't have any way of getting around. They have very little logistics, very little command and control.

Is there any potential for one of the member states of NATO helping or NATO themselves helping, because I just feel like this is one of those situations that we're all going to look back on and wonder: How did we let it happen again?

JONES: Darfur has been a subject of the secretary general of NATO's discussion with them, the North Atlantic Council, but it hasn't resulted in any traction for the alliance to do something as an alliance.

JONES: It is a horrific situation, but whatever's being done is going to have to be done on a bilateral basis, because the consensus has not emerged in the North Atlantic Council.

It's regrettable, but the secretary general is doing what he can to illuminate the problem and to force discussions on it. But as yet there has been no consensus with regard to any kind of NATO mission there.

CLINTON: Well, my time is up, but I just find that so regrettable, because, you know, here we are, it's 2005, we can't get the Security Council to do anything, we can't get NATO to do anything, you know, and everybody knows what's happening.

And, you know, we do have these relationships with the African Union, and I know you've really advanced our commitments there.

And I look at this extraordinary map and see these developing partnerships, you know, our credibility, it seems to me, is going to be very low if we can't even get them a transport plane or do something to help them with some visible means of support.

So, you know, perhaps this could be carried on at, you know, at a level within our own government, because I just worry that all the good work you're trying to do in Africa will look like it's basically insubstantial and unsupported.

JONES (?): We periodically point out that one of the qualities and capabilities built into the NATO Response Force is, in fact, to do humanitarian relief and disaster relief operations. So it's a capability that is increasingly resident in our portfolio, so to speak.

But as you know, in order to act, we need the political consensus. So when that comes, I think that within the inventory of NATO there's quite a few things that we could do in disaster relief and the one you're talking about in particular.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSED BUDGET REQUEST FOR FISCAL YEAR 2006 AND THE FUTURE YEARS DEFENSE PROGRAM, 3/3/2005

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I thank all of you gentlemen for being here. We appreciate your service and your patience.

I want to try to clarify for my own concerns the treatment of wounded soldiers, both active-duty, Guard and Reserves.

And first to Secretary Harvey. I've previously requested information about this situation arising and first coming to my attention because of the condition of Specialist Robert Loria of Middletown, New York, who lost an arm serving our nation in Iraq.

And last year as he was getting ready to return back to New York for the holidays, he was expecting to receive a paycheck of about $4,500. But instead he was told by the Army that he owed the Army money.

It appears that Specialist Loria was caught up in bureaucratic red tape. He was being billed for travel and expenses that he should not have owed. And in the course of intervening on behalf of Specialist Loria, I was told that the Army had identified 19 more soldiers who were treated the same way.

Then my office began receiving additional complaints about the way wounded soldiers' debts and pay issues were being handled. So I wrote to you, Secretary Harvey, on January 19th asking that you examine whether this was a systemic problem.

And, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my letter to Secretary Harvey be included in the record.

WARNER: Without objection.

CLINTON: I asked Army Vice Chief of Staff General Richard Cody about this at a hearing a couple of weeks ago. And on February 4th, he sent me a letter saying that the Army had identified 129 soldiers with payment and debt issues but that the Army had put systems in place to rectify the problem.

He also stated in that letter that I would be receiving a more formal response later from Secretary Harvey.

And, again, Mr. Chairman, I ask consent that this letter be placed in the record.

WARNER: Without objection.

CLINTON: Now, General Cody's letter stated that the Army had assigned an audit team to find and recommend solutions to the pay problem.

So my questions are the following: Now, Specialist Loria was based out of Fort Hood, and did the Army conduct audits for units other than those based out of Fort Hood?

Secondly, does the figure of 129 cases of wounded soldiers that experienced pay issues related in General Cody's letter reflect just soldiers based at Fort Hood or was there a broader examination of the issue in the Army?

Thirdly, does the Army plan to go back and audit the treatment of all wounded soldiers who have left Walter Reed or other facilities to see if they had pay problems?

And finally, I would like to request that the Army provide to me and the committee that status of all audits of pay problems of wounded soldiers, as well as an update of a number of soldiers who have been identified as having such pay problems. Because I'm concerned that we don't perhaps have a full understanding of this problem.

And that is compounded by the recent story about the way Guard members and reservists are being treated. Because right now when a reservist or Guard member is sent to a military hospital in the United States, their overseas orders are revoked and they lose their combat pay allowance. And since they can't go back to their civilian occupation while they remain in the military hospital, they and their families suffer a financial disadvantage.

So we're looking for ways to really understand the extent of this problem. We know we have more than 11,000 wounded soldiers, Marines and others.

And so, first, Secretary Harvey, with respect to my specific questions, I did receive a letter just today from General Hagenbeck providing additional information.

I'd like to include that in the record, as well.

WARNER: Without objection.

CLINTON: But I'm worried that this is a much broader problem than we are yet focusing on.

HARVEY: Thanks for your questions. As I said in my opening statement, attaining a quality of life for our soldiers and their families that match the quality of their service is very important to me. It's my number-one priority, when I go around to bases, is providing for their well-being. This is a component of it.

I, like you, in general, it's disturbing that these things happen. They shouldn't happen. The objective here is perfection. I don't want to see any wounded soldier have any problems with pay.

Now, when I first got on board, I was given these briefings about how we're going to fix this through information systems. I said, "You know, I've been down this road a long time." And next I'm going to hear is in 2009, we'll have perfection. And that's when you get these information system briefings, that's what you get. And maybe in 2009, the world will be perfect.

But, you know, what are you going to do today? And we have set up and beefed up our hotlines so that if there's any problem -- it doesn't matter whether they're wounded or not, but wounded are very important -- that they have a means and a short-term means to get this resolved.

I'm pleased to say that in the Guard the statistics -- the Guard and Reserve statistics I have are that February of '05 there was something on the order of 15,000 requests a day or a week on pay problems. December, it was down to 400. That's progress, but 400 is too many. Zero is the objective.

In the active, we try to resolve pay problems. Our objective is 90 percent the first day. We're about 75 percent.

So we're taking actions, Senator, in order to fix this. And my plan is not just to -- this is just not a Fort Hood problem. This has to be a system-wide problem, and that we will audit and ensure that this is the case.

Now, in this hotline which also for the techie types is also an Internet site that you can go to and get, you know, the frequently asked questions answered. There's a software package behind that, also behind all the phone calls, we where get the reasons why it happened so that we can take corrective action in the system.

So besides just answering it and trying to fix it, we want to know where the system problems are, so as we develop these systems and interconnect and link up the financial system with the human resource system that we, in fact, fix this forever.

CLINTON: Thank you.

HARVEY: But I will keep you informed of that. I am aware of your letters. And I will give you a comprehensive response. General Cody gave you response. General Hagenbeck gave you response. And as we go and do these audits, I'll certainly keep you informed of that.

It's an important issue, my number-one priority is soldiers and their families. And I'm going to put words into actions. I'm glad you're concerned. I'm concerned. And we're going to take care of this.

I hope that I'm up here next year and you're going to say, "I haven't heard of anything for the last three or four months."

CLINTON: That's my hope, as well.

And could I just very briefly ask each of the secretaries if they would support efforts to ensure that wounded Guard members and reservists don't lose their combat pay allowance while they are in a military hospital and that we postpone that until they are discharged?

Secretary Harvey and then Secretary England.

Secretary England?

ENGLAND: I guess I'm not familiar with the issue, Senator, so, I mean, I'm inclined to say yes, but I'm not sure of this issue.

CLINTON: "Yes" is the right answer.

(LAUGHTER)

ENGLAND: I'm not familiar...

(CROSSTALK)

ENGLAND: This is an easy one. Yes, my colleague's in favor. I'll support him. So the answer is yes.

TEETS: Indeed, senator.

CLINTON: Thank you.

And finally, Mr. Chairman...

WARNER: Thank you for asking that question and clarifying that, because, you know, thousands of families are following these hearings and trying to ascertain the simple answer that you've elicited from these persons with the responsibility to see that it happens.

Thank you.

CLINTON: Thank you.

And one final point, Mr. Chairman. I've heard that there are some efforts, with respect to the supplemental, to decrease the amount of money going to Afghanistan reconstruction efforts. And I know there are many competing considerations within our military and stability needs.

But having just returned from Afghanistan, I think that would send a terrible signal. I mean, one of real challenges we face is demonstrating to the people and government of Afghanistan, the region, and the world that we are there for the long-term, we are committed, we are not walking away from this responsibility.

I'm very enthusiastic about the leadership of President Karzai and his government. But the city of Kabul, the countryside is in just terrible shape. And the help that they need in order to get on their feet is something that I hope we will continue to place as a high priority.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON THE NOMINATION OF ANTHONY PRINCIPI TO BE A MEMBER OF THE BASE REALIGNMENT AND CLOSURE COMMISSION, 3/15/2005

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I appreciated the last exchange, because I can't resist saying Fort Drum, New York, has live training, live-firing training ranges that are totally without any objection from anyone anywhere and we could grow considerably, Mr. Secretary.

I thank you for being here and I thank you for this continuation of your public service. It has been a real pleasure to work with you in the past and I look forward to continuing our relationship.

I really appreciated the answers that you gave to the questions that we submitted to you in advance. And I am very particularly grateful for the way you answered with respect to what was required of you as chairman, and just for the record I think this really bears repeating, and I quote, "As chairman, I believe it is important to set the tone for our deliberations, to ensure that our work is devoid of politics, to address potential conflicts of interest, to be independent, fair, open and equitable, to build consensus and to ensure the communities and people impacted by the BRAC process have an opportunity to be heard," unquote.

I could not have anticipated a better response, and it really fits with everything that I know about you and the work that we've done together.

Obviously, each of us is concerned about our overall configuration for the future, where bases will be, what those base's missions will be, how we move people from overseas back home. There are just a lot of large, unanswered questions that you will have a major role in helping us answer. And then we each have to be concerned about what happens in our individual states, and I know that you are aware of the long history of New York's contribution to our military.

In fact, I think, Mr. Chairman, I was told the other day that certainly going back to the very beginning of our nation, New York has sacrificed more people in the service of our country than any other state, and we are very proud of that. But we didn't have a good experience in the last BRAC process. I wasn't part of it, but I have talked to enough people who have reported to me the demoralizing, discouraging impact of having the professional recommendations at the last minute for political reasons overturned. And we ended up losing two air force bases, Griffith (ph) and Plattsburg, that, you know, ended having any significant air force presence along our northern border for, you know, most of the United States. And now, of course, with the additional needs of moving quickly across the Atlantic to Iraq and Afghanistan, of our homeland security demands, in retrospect, you know, that may not have been a wise decision.

So we are looking forward to and counting on you to be able to fulfill those very significant pledges that you made in your answers to our questions.

One matter I would like to raise is, I know that there was some problem with the CARES process, that you were very, very receptive to dealing with, and that was a lot of local communities felt they didn't get a chance to be heard. Have you given any thought as to how you will ensure that communities have an adequate opportunity to make sure their views are heard?

PRINCIPI: Yes, Senator, I think it is terribly important, and we certainly tried to do so with CARES. We may have failed in some instances, but that was really a very core component.

Certainly, in addition to the Washington hearings, I intend to have regional hearings across the country. You know, geographically located so that people will have access and can testify, not only state and local officials, but private citizens.

It is my intent, although I haven't seen the list, don't know what's on the list, to send commissioners out to every installation that is going to be impacted by the recommendations that come forward and an opportunity to meet with people, both the base commander, the local officials and to the degree possible the private sector. And then I'm sure we'll have a Web site setup where we can, you know, get information from the local community.

So I think if we're going to succeed and we're going to alleviate the cynicism and the political mistrust, we have to reach out to the people and give them an opportunity to be heard.

I think our challenge, Senator, is that the timelines are so tight. May 16, a report has to be in to the president by September 8. That's a tough, tough row to hoe but we'll do our best.

CLINTON: Well, I appreciate that, and I know that the criteria that have been adopted, you know, certainly give us the guidelines that we need. And looking at the contributions that a number of the bases have made to our ongoing missions overseas, I am very proud of the fact that, you know, our National Guard and Reserve bases have made significant contributions.

How will you look to give geographic balance to our basing structure? And particularly to the ability of Guard and Reserve forces, to be able to train and deploy in an area where they live? I'm concerned that with the stresses on the Guard and Reserve that we've seen in the last several years, some of the information we're getting about some difficulties in retention and recruitment for the Guard and Reserves. If we make it even more difficult for people to participate by, you know, moving the bases further and further away from population centers, that could be a real problem for us.

PRINCIPI: It certainly could be and we'll certainly look at that very carefully.

It's my hope that those factors are being taken into consideration in compiling this list.

You know, the criteria really do speak to the total force. It doesn't speak just to the active force. It speaks to the total force, and that includes the Guard and the Reserve. It talks about staging areas for homeland security. The northern border and things of that nature. And those are all factors that this commission needs to ensure, that independent checks are being done, are in conformance with the force structure plan and those criteria that is established in the law.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Secretary.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON NATIONAL SECURITY THREATS, 3/17/2005

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And welcome, Director Goss and Admiral Jacoby.

I thank you both for your service and for being here to respond to our questions.

CLINTON: The Department of Homeland Security has been trying to focus the anti-terrorism spending that it has jurisdiction over in a more strategic risk-based manner.

And through their analysis, they've identified a number of possible attacks that it views as most plausible or devastating, including the detonation of a nuclear device in a major city, the release of sarin nerve agent in office buildings, and a truck bombing of a sports arena.

I'd like to ask you both: What role, if any, did the CIA and the DIA have in working with the Department of Homeland Security in generating this analysis and list?

GOSS: Senator, I don't believe that CIA had much role in that at all.

The breakdown in DHS between domestic and foreign, as you know, is very critical -- because Americans don't spy on Americans and we keep our foreign intelligence program overseas.

However, we do provide information. That is the place where we come together.

And so the degree of information that might have gone into some estimates on that, it's very possible and probably likely that some CIA sources are -- some of our channels were used in making estimates about the likelihood of a chem-bio attack or so forth.

But as to sitting down and assessing directly where the risks are in the homeland, that would be a little bit out of our lane.

CLINTON: Admiral?

JACOBY: Senator, the same. Clearly, the discussion about the potential threats goes on in the community forum, but we would not have participated in homeland security's internal prioritization and ordering of the threats.

CLINTON: You know, at several hearings by this committee, I've asked about the level of coordination between DOD, the intelligence community and the Department of Homeland Security, because I'm concerned that we may not have the appropriate level of information sharing and coordination.

For example, I was struck by the comments in the newspapers today about the anthrax scare in the DOD facility and the either failure to or inability to better coordinate with the public health response mechanism and the like.

So I appreciate greatly the wall between the different and appropriate roles that each of you have between domestic and international. But I'm not yet persuaded that we have as a sufficient a coordination as we need.

Now, I know that the DNI and how that is stood up will perhaps play some role in that, but I think it would be useful to, again, think more closely. Because if you look at the list that DHS has put forth -- nuclear detonation, sarin nerve agent, truck bombing -- it's almost impossible to imagine that there isn't quite a bit of overlap in trying to make those assessments between what we know, what the information is we're gathering abroad.

CLINTON: Obviously, much of this list is based on DHS's assessment of the intelligence that it's receiving and how it's evaluating it.

So I'm hoping that we can continue to improve the flow of information and the coordination, and I would, you know, look forward to hearing any ideas you might have on that.

Secondly, I read this week that General Musharraf said the Pakistani army might have come close to capturing bin Laden near the Afghan border in late spring or early summer of last year. Could each of you enlighten us on the status of the hunt for bin Laden?

GOSS: Senator, thank you.

For the first part of the question, I totally agree. The level of coordination is a constant job. We always have to be working at that.

It's not just cooperation. It's moving information. It's needing to share it with those who need to know it, and that takes some doing.

We're dealing with horizontal integration as well as vertical -- down to the state, local and so forth, and municipal.

Some of this is sort of new for some people, and it's actually happening. It's perhaps not happening as fast as we'd like, but it is happening and will continue to happen because the thrust is all that way.

So I think that I would agree with your surmise that the info sharing is not sufficient yet, but the trend lines are good and the momentum and the push we are giving it is right. I think we have the right direction.

As for talking about some of the information, we do have a problem, candidly, between what sometimes -- we pick things up somewhere around the world and the many ways we do it. We're not really sure whether it's real. And even it's a wonderful source, we're not sure whether the source got it -- whether it's wishful thinking or coffee house chatter or something else.

So what's a real plot, and when somebody says trucking industry or a big building or something similar, is that a real plot or is it wishful thinking?

Those kinds of fine filter are a new kind of analysis for us. We're doing better at it and there's room for improvement still.

In terms of the hunt for bin Laden, I would like to reserve some of that for the closed session.

I could simply say it goes on. It is very informed, and I would agree that there are times when we have been closer than not.

CLINTON: Admiral?

JACOBY: I join the DCI and would like to follow up in closed also please.

CLINTON: Director Goss, in the last 10 days or so, former Senator Sam Nunn gave a very thorough and somewhat disheartening speech about the status of nonproliferation efforts, at the National Press Club.

CLINTON: And the thrust seemed to be that we are losing ground and perhaps opportunities to dismantle and prevent the potential misuse of nuclear material and weaponry, particularly out of the former Soviet Union.

Have you had a chance to read Senator Nunn's speech?

GOSS: I have not.

CLINTON: Have you, Admiral Jacoby?

JACOBY: I have not been able to.

CLINTON: Well, obviously, I have a very high regard for Senator Nunn for his experience in this area.

And perhaps if I could, Mr. Chairman, I would appreciate getting some response with respect to the specific point Senator Nunn made from both of our witnesses at some future point.

WARNER: I think that is very much an issue before this committee. And if each of you would provide for the record, at your convenience, a response to Senator Clint's questions.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN ENSIGN (R-NV) HOLDS HEARING ON MILITARY INSTALLATION PROGRAMS IN REVIEW OF THE FISCAL YEAR 2006 DEFENSE BUDGET, 4/6/2005

COMMITTEE: READINESS AND MANAGEMENT SUPPORT SUBCOMMITTEE

SUBCOMMITTEE: SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

CLINTON: I was waiting for that.

THUNE: I know you were waiting for that. Senator from New York, it's yours, go ahead.

I've got a couple questions. Could I submit for the record?

ENSIGN: We're all going to submit questions for the record.

Senator Clinton, try to keep it as brief as possible?

CLINTON: I will. And I'll talk fast.

And I wanted to thank Senator Cornyn for bringing up the homeland defense issue. Mr. Prosch came to Fort Hamilton, the only remaining installation within New York City, which was an important staging area after 9/11.

I'd like to ask just briefly everyone to answer yes or no. You know, with the onset of BRAC, I know that a number of communities are making promises to finance the construction of facilities. However, New York communities, since '95, have already been proactive in making investments in their installations prior to this BRAC round.

And during that last BRAC round, we saw many offers that never materialized into concrete results once the installations were saved. I'd like to ask each of you: Will offers from state and local governments to finance the construction of facilities, whether privatized or not, be considered as part of the BRAC process, just yes or no?

GRONE: Complex answer, but no, generally, we're dealing with facts on the ground.

CLINTON: Mr. Prosch?

PROSCH: We've got $200 million of MILCON at West Point alone that we're going to continue to...

CLINTON: But that's public money. I mean, I'm talking about communities coming and saying, "You know, we're going to put money into this. The state's going to put money into this." And you know, I thought we -- I think Mr. Grone's right.

We should take the facts as we find them on the ground, especially since in the '95 round a lot of communities came forth and said, "Save this base. We'll put $10 million into this, the state will put $20 million," and it never happened. And I just want to be sure that the criteria is, as Mr. Grone, says for each of the services.

PROSCH: Yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Secretary Penn?

PENN: Yes, ma'am, as stated, no.

CLINTON: And Secretary Gibbs?

GIBBS: No.

CLINTON: The rationale for the 2005 BRAC round has been somewhat of a moving target. We've heard arguments that it's designed to achieve jointness, to eliminate encroachment, to save money, to reduce capacity, and more recently, to reset and reposition forces. You know, it's difficult, I think, for a lot of us to quite figure out what criteria the services are using.

And I guess, Mr. Grone, this would be for you. Shouldn't an objective analysis of a location's military value and cost of operation drive the process, as opposed to a more abstract formula that somehow this will lead to, you know, rearranging the deck chairs in some preordained manner?

GRONE: Well, Senator, the criteria that the secretary caused to have published last year, the guide to process their foundation, a core element of the foundation of this process lays out the criteria by which the secretary will develop those recommendations.

Military value, pursuant to congressional direction, as well as departmental policy, is the highest consideration. The costs of operations and manpower implications of a given potential recommendation are also part of a military value -- are part of that military equation.

That said, while we have those selection criteria, the secretary has talked about the importance of utilizing the round to enhance force transformation, to improve joint utilization of our assets, to convert waste to war-fighting, in terms of the structures that we no longer require, as well as to use it as a means by which we can efficiently accommodate forces returning to abroad.

But all of that will be done within the context of the selection criteria and the force structure plan provided to Congress.

CLINTON: Well, obviously, our highest hope is that that's exactly what does happen. You know, we spend a lot of time in both houses of Congress trying to hammer out those criteria.

And at the end of the last BRAC processes, I'm sure you've been told numerous times by people from New York, we believe that inappropriate political considerations were used at the, you know, very last minute. And that left a very bad taste in a lot of people's mouths.

I mean, you know, New York has a great tradition of military service. And people there, I think, are under special pressures because of terrorism and the continue understanding that New York is the number-one target. So if military value is the criteria, we don't want to see, you know, political considerations intervene.

Thank you.

GRONE: Senator, I can assure you, and the chairman, and the ranking member that political considerations are not a factor in the secretary and the leadership's consideration.

(CROSSTALK)

CLINTON: Thank you.

ENSGN: Thank you.

I want to thank the entire panel and all the senators. And once again, I apologize for the briefness of this hearing. But the hearing is closed.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON ENG-LAND/MULLEN NOMINATIONS,
4/19/2005

CLINTON: Thank you very much. And welcome, indeed.

I've enjoyed working with you in your capacity as Navy secretary, and look forward to continuing that relationship.

I think from the questions that have been posed thus far, Secretary England, you get an idea of the unanswered questions and some of the frustration that members of the committee feel.

Speaking just as one member of the committee, it was a very difficult relationship with your predecessor. Very often, we didn't get answers, we didn't get follow-up. We rarely got the kind of response that this committee and this body deserve to have.

So it's a welcome change to have you before us.

There are a number of concerns that have already been raised, and I'd like to focus on just a few more.

I'm concerned about the continuing use of supplementals to fund permanent force structure changes. We've seen the department rely on supplementals in both fiscal year '05 and '06 to fund existing or planned end-strengthen increases, as well as permanent changes in force structure, known as modularity in the Army, force structure review group for the Marine Corp.

Earlier this year, when I asked the Army's chief of staff, General Schoomaker, why the Army's '06 budget did not fund the personnel level of 512,000 the Army actually plans to have instead of the 482,000 that are funded in the budget, he stated that he was given the option of funding those extra people in his core budget or in an '06 supplemental, and he chose the supplemental so he wouldn't have to displace other programs.

Now, if the senior leadership of the department gives the services the choice of funding programs below the line or above the line, of course they're going to pick the same options that the Army did and that the Marines did in this budget: Put it on the supplemental tab.

But programs like modularity are not surprises. They're intended to be permanent changes in the way the services operate. And in my view, it's not responsible budgeting.

So let me ask you, do you believe it is sound budgetary management practice to submit budgets that do not fund the actual level of active duty people DOD intends to have on board in '06 and to include only a small portion of the operating, construction and modernization costs of ongoing restructuring plans, such as modularity?

And if confirmed, would you work with us to ensure that DOD sends us a budget that realistically reflects personnel levels and long-term modernization efforts?

ENGLAND: Senator, we will definitely work with you. And I appreciate the opportunity to do so.

Regarding the supplementals, my understanding -- and responsible for Department of Navy budget -- is that when we have predictable and what I call everyday things that we know are going to happen, we put those in the budget. If it's unpredictable, like a war continues, we put in the supplemental.

I don't know about the Army center. I wasn't given an option about what goes in or out of the budget. I mean, it's in our budget.

ENGLAND: Now, the devil's in the detail. Like, right now, we are working on the '07 budget, so there is this long lead time in terms of what is predictable.

So when we know what it's going to be, and it is the course of business of the department definitely it should be in the budget. So when we know those costs, they should be in the budget, which unpredictable contingency, sort of, operations obviously we'll need a supplemental.

So I think that's the policy, and I believe that is a valid policy. There may be some differences in the detail, but keep in mind, we have a long lead time in terms of putting those budgets together.

CLINTON: Well, I'm very happy to hear that. And the Senate passed a sense of the Senate resolution yesterday making the same point, so that we would have budgeting that would be reflective long term of the costs that we know we're going to be incurring.

With respect to that, my colleagues Senate Reed (ph) and Senator Hagel have been the leaders in arguing that we need to grow the end- strength of the Army. And that is something that we've not yet really come to terms with from the department's perspective.

What are your views about increasing Army end-strength? And is it something that will be addressed in the QDR?

ENGLAND: Yes, it will. We will specifically look at force size in the QDR, Senator.

And I would recommend that we go through the QDR because we'll be starting with capabilities, but we will get down to a force-sizing construct.

And that report is due next February. Hopefully, we can hold that schedule.

It is a very complex and a very important QDR. The last QDR of course was before 9/11, so this is now reflecting the world that exists today.

I will be very complex, but it will certainly point to force sizes. And in terms of total force my expectation is that we will be able to get down in terms of numbers of specific assets, and as questions come up here today, how many of what assets do we need.

So this will be a very comprehensive look in the QDR, and hopefully we'll have some answers for you at the end of this QDR, Senator.

CLINTON: We will look forward to that. I know that there's a continuing effort on the part of many of us to try to get an answer on the end strength of the Army.

My time is up, but yesterday on Long Island my colleague from the House Congress Steve Israel and I held a hearing with military families and vets. And the problem that our Guard and Reserve families are encountering are heartbreaking.

And despite the fact that we have tried to address some of these issues, like the absence of health care, like the continuing problems with companies foreclosing on homes, repossessing autos while a loved one is deployed in Iraq or Afghanistan, it is having a terrible impact on the morale of families, which, of course, has a boomerang effect on the morale of the serving Guard or Reserve member.

CLINTON: And I would just urge that some of us, Lindsey Graham and I and others, have been pushing for some very positive changes with respect to health care and retirement. And we need to do that.

I'm worried about our recruitment and retention goals in the Guard and Reserve, and we would look for some support and guidance from you in your new position.

Thank you very much.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN ENSIGN (R-NV) HOLDS HEARING ON IRAQI FREEDOM/MILITARY READINESS, 4/20/2005

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you for holding this hearing.

And I welcome all of you here. I'm especially pleased to see General Austin, the commanding general of the 10th Mountain Division in Fort Drum, New York.

He has done a fabulous job leading the 10th Mountain Division, which for the record is the most deployed division in, I think not just the Army, but any part of our armed services.

I'm also pleased to see General Sattler. I had a very informative and inspiring visit to Fallujah, and appreciated very much the briefing that General Sattler and his team gave us about the action in Fallujah and the eventual victory over the insurgents.

I wanted to start by asking General Austin, the 10th Mountain Division has been at the forefront of the Army's transformation to modular brigades. And with the change to modular brigades -- as you pointed out, we have two additional brigades, one at Fort Drum, one at Fort Polk. And I know that this transition creates certain challenges for both leadership and for the soldiers themselves.

How would you assess the change that's occurred to modular brigades? And any advice and any lessons as that modularity is unfolding that we need to be learning from and perhaps responding to?

AUSTIN: Well, Senator Clinton, I think that we are indeed learning from ourselves as we go through this transformation process.

As you know the 3rd Infantry Division was the first to transform. We went to school on the 3rd Infantry Division and therefore were able to avoid some of the issues that they were faced with because we learned from them. They were great in sharing their lessons.

In terms of challenges, I think any time you move to a new formation there will be some challenges, because there are some unknowns. I think our force has dealt with that very effectively.

But I think the real issue with transformation is that we will be more capable. We'll have brigades that are highly deployable, they are self-contained, and all brigades will be standardized.

And so I think in the end, we will provide a great capability to the Joint Force Command.

In the 10th Mountain Division, we are about three-quarters of the way through our transformation. One of the transformed brigades is going to deploy to Iraq here in July. They've done a magnificent job of getting themselves set, training up their leaders. And I think they will be much value added once they get on the ground.

But to answer your question, Senator Clinton, I think we've handled the challenge very, very well, principally because we've learned from those units who have gone through the transformation process earlier.

CLINTON: Thank you.

I've listened carefully as all of you responded to the chairman's question about the body armor and the armored vehicles -- the Humvees, the convoy vehicles. And the one thing that I'm not sure any of you can address -- but perhaps General Metz you might be in the best position -- we continue to hear stories mostly from the field that our Guard and Reserve units are not as well equipped as active duty.

We have 40 percent of our overall force in Iraq being Guard and Reserve. And at least, if you were to check my e-mails and my letters and the comments I get from parents and spouses, we still aren't there yet.

Do you have any assessment that you could share with us about the state of equipment for the Guard and Reserve troops that are either there or on their way being deployed?

METZ: I think we mapped the challenges back into the mobilization process so that when the Guard and Reserve units arrive at the mobilization station, we owe them a good look at their equipment so that we identify right away what they may be short, because as we know they could very well be short.

As they go through that training process and that identification, our goal is to ensure they don't go north of the berm in Kuwait without the right equipment and trained to use that equipment.

My experience was that those enhanced separate brigades that were combat brigades in the combat support and service support units, once in Kuwait and coming north, were correctly outfitted with the equipment and had the training to conduct themselves successfully.

And once in country, I saw no difference in the performance of those brigades than any other brigade. They were one of, at one point, 23 U.S. brigades in country. And we tasked them and used them just as they were active. And the performance of those soldiers was equal to the active duty soldiers.

So it's a process all along the continuum to ensure -- and we owe them that -- to ensure that they are trained and equipped before we put them into harm's way.

CLINTON: General Sattler?

SATTLER: Senator Clinton, if I might?

First of all, ma'am, lest the 3rd Marine Division Association hunt me down like a dog, I must say that as much as I love Lloyd Austin and the climb to glory 10th Mountain Division, the 1st Marine Division's also done two complete pumps into Iraq.

Don't want to split hairs on it, but I got to at least get that onto the table, because I've got to go back to my family when this is all said and done.

(LAUGHTER)

But on the Guard, the 155 Enhanced Separate Brigade out of Mississippi came in to replace the two marine expeditionary units that were ashore. And those were two fort (ph) Marine units that had had Najaf and Karbala.

When General Metz brought them in they were fully trained up. They did the pre-deployment site survey.

When they showed up we did about an almost three-week right seat/left seat ride where they married up with the two Marine units and they traded tactics, techniques, procedures and environmentals you can only pick up from being on the ground.

When they left, when the Marines pulled out, the National Guard brigade had that throat (ph) to Baghdad for two major events. The Ashura, which is the big pilgrimage, followed by the Arabian (ph). And they did marvelous in both.

So I will tell you that there's a little bit of training that needs to be done, as General Metz indicated. When they came on board, we embedded some of our Marines, mainly in the high-tech areas of communication.

They had the enthusiasm and the energy, they just needed a little bit of tweaking on it. And they were off and running.

So I would second what General Metz said, ma'am.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, General.

Admiral, I just wanted to ask you, in your statement you said your strike group deployed to the CENTCOM fully trained and equipped. And I know there have been some changes in the Navy's East Coast training in the last few years.

Could you elaborate on whether the Navy's current training locations and procedures on the East Coast allow our naval forces to prepare and train for the assigned missions they're being given?

MCCULLOUGH: Yes, ma'am.

Our training on the East Coast is very good to prepare us for deployment.

We used to use, as you know, the range at Vieques to qualify our surface ships and naval surface fire support. When we left Vieques, we've developed using acoustic devices and timing and synthetic geography to put in our combat systems to enable our ships to qualify in that tactic at sea. So we have no use for a live fire range per se for naval gunfire support.

We've used the ranges at Pinecastle and Avon Park in Florida -- and we thank the state of Florida very much for making those available to us -- that have enhanced our capability to get our air wings ready to go.

And we also deploy the air wing to Fallon to undergo its strike training in the state of Nevada.

So I can unequivocally say that our forces are more ready today to deploy than they ever have been in the past.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON DE-FENSE INTELLIGENCE BUDGET, 4/28/2005

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Admiral Jacoby, the last unclassified assessment of North Korea's nuclear weapons from January 2002 read as follows: "We assess that North Korea has produced enough plutonium for at least one and possibly two nuclear weapons," unquote.

When Director Goss was asked for the current CIA assessment at our hearing, an open hearing in February, he said, and I quote, "Our assessment is that they have a greater capability than that assessment." In other words, it has increased since then. He added that other agencies had other assessments and that there is a range.

I'd like to explore this with you. What is the current DIA assessment?

JACOBY: Senator, when we did our threat testimony and had that discussion, I mentioned that we were in the process of going back and doing a fundamental review all the way back to source information back in the early '90s.

My senior analysts are working that up right now, and so I don't have a new assessment for you.

But I can talk to the range. The citation you had talked about enough materials for one to two weapons. And then Mr. Goss' comment was that there's an additional capability. That came from the unloading and probable reprocessing of the rods out of the Yongbyon nuclear plant.

JACOBY: So that's why you end up with a new amount of material and new opportunities for weapons manufacturing.

I'd like to get back to you in approximately two weeks with the results of the assessment we've done, and that will give you an update on where DIA is in terms of our assessment and projection on the future of the program.

CLINTON: I would appreciate that, Admiral.

And can you tell us what the unclassified assessment is regarding how far along North Korea's highly enriched uranium program is?

JACOBY: Senator, I'm not sure if there is an unclassified assessment. I believe I need to take that into the closed session.

CLINTON: And would you provide that to us at your earliest convenience?

JACOBY: Right.

And I was going to say, and we'll roll that into the overall assessment program that's ongoing. It was part of it.

CLINTON: This past weekend, The Washington Post and Wall Street Journal reported that North Korea may be preparing for a nuclear test. And the press has also reported increased activity at North Korean missile sites.

Under what conditions does the intelligence community believe the North Korean government would conduct a nuclear test?

JACOBY: Senator, I believe I need to take that for closed session and lay out a set of assessments and options that have been considered.

CLINTON: Obviously, since North Korea has recently stated it does not feel bound by its earlier self-declared missile testing moratorium, that's a matter of grave concern to many of us as to the assessments that we have with respect to their intentions.

According to a March 15th Washington Times article, a North Korean foreign ministry spokesman said, "Reality proves that our possession of nuclear weapons guarantees balance of power in the region and acts as a strong deterrent against the outbreak of war and for maintaining peace."

CLINTON: He went on to add that, "the North will take necessary countermeasures including bolstering of its nuclear arsenal to cope with the extremely hostile attempt of the United States to bring down our system," unquote.

Admiral, do you have an opinion as to whether North Korea would be willing under certain circumstances, including a guarantee by the United States not to forcibly attempt to change North Korea's regime, to give up its nuclear program?

JACOBY: Senator, our assessment is that the nuclear capabilities and the ambiguity that they have pursued for so many years was a major bargaining chip leverage in their position.

Our assessment has been that it's unlikely that they would negotiate away completely that capability or associated ambiguities because of their concerns about changing world events, regional dynamics and so forth, that that would be viewed by them as leaving them vulnerable.

CLINTON: Of course, we haven't been all that successful preventing their continued attempts to obtain nuclear weapons, have we? And we find ourselves now in a position that strikes me as a failed policy with grave consequences for the region and the world.

Let me go on here and ask that -- you know, the press reported last month that the intelligence community recently learned that North Korea may have transferred nuclear-related material to Libya.

Admiral, what can you tell us about that in an open forum?

JACOBY: We need to go into that in closed, Senator.

CLINTON: OK. This is an area of grave concern to me and I assume to many others of my colleagues. And it's very frustrating. We have been locked into this six-party talk idea now for a number of years and all the while, we've seen North Korea going about the business of acquiring nuclear weapons and the missile capacity to deliver those to the shores of the United States.

And so, Admiral, let me ask you, do you assess that North Korea has the ability to arm a missile with a nuclear device?

JACOBY: The assessment is that they have the capability to do that, yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: And do you assess that North Korea has the ability to deploy a two-stage intercontinental missile, a nuclear missile that could successfully hit U.S. territory?

JACOBY: Yes, the assessment on a two-stage missile would give the ability to reach portions of U.S. territory, and the projection on a three-stage missile would be that it would be able to reach most of the continental United States.

That still is a -- that's a theoretical capability in the sense that those missiles have not been tested. But that is part of the community position, yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: So the two-stage you are testifying is already within their operational capacity?

JACOBY: Assessed to be within their capacity, yes.

CLINTON: And that's the West Coast of the United States?

JACOBY: I would need to look at the range arcs. It's certainly Alaska and Hawaii, and I believe a portion of the Northwest.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, I -- you know, with all due respect, Mr. Ranking Member, with all due respect, you know, it is troubling beyond words that we have testimony like that at this time. And, you know, there is that old saying, you know, if you're in a hole, quit digging. And this administration just keeps getting bigger shovels, and it bothers me greatly.

And focusing on what we can even talk about in an open forum should give pause not only to the Congress, but I hope to the administration.

Thank you.

LEVIN: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

And the chairman has authorized me to bring the hearing to a close. I want to, though, associate myself with your concerns about Korea, the direction in which they are moving, the failure of our policies to deter that movement.

I would just add one additional thought to the points that you've raised, and that is that our allies, the South Koreans, would like us to engage in talks directly with the North Koreans, but we won't do it despite their desire that we do so.

And it seems to me it's extraordinary that when your allies in the region want you to engage both in the multilateral and the bilateral talks, there's no inconsistency between them that we refuse to engage in the bilateral talks.

Thank you. And we will stand in recess. We will go to S-407.

Thank you both for your testimony. And the record will stay open for the usual 48 hours for additional questions.

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY) DELIVERS REMARKS TO THE AMERICAN ISRAEL PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, 5/24/2005

CLINTON: Welcome to Washington for this extraordinary AIPAC conference. I'm told that the attendance far surpasses any other conference, and it's always been one of the biggest gatherings that Washington hosts every year.

So I congratulate you for being here in these numbers with this energy and enthusiasm.

(APPLAUSE)

I also thank my friend Bernice, who has served so well on behalf of AIPAC, and congratulate Howard Friedman, the incoming president. I thank Howard Kohr, your executive director, Amy Friedkin, and everyone who works so hard for AIPAC, not just when there's a great gathering like this conference, but every single day, working with us in the Congress, working here in Washington.

(APPLAUSE)

I want to take just a few minutes to discuss some of the significant challenges facing the United States, Israel and our world today.

As you know better than most, events in the Middle East are absolutely critical to our hope for a safer, more secure world, a world in which every nation is free from the threat of global terrorism.

And a strong, lasting relationship between the United States and Israel is essential to our efforts to build that world of peace and security.

(APPLAUSE)

As all of us know, our future here in this country is intertwined with the future of Israel and the Middle East. Now, there's a lot that we could talk about and, obviously, much has been discussed. But, in the short period that I have been given the honor of addressing you, I want to start by focusing on our deep and lasting bond between the United States and Israel.

Now, these are bonds that are more than shared interests. These are bonds forged in a common struggle for human rights, for democracy, for freedom. These are bonds that predate the creation of the state of Israel, that really predate the creation of the United States, because they are rooted in fundamental beliefs and values about the dignity and rights of men and women to live in freedom, free from fear, free from oppression.

CLINTON: And there is no doubt that these incredibly strong bonds and values will remain as the lone star of our relationship with our democratic friend and ally, Israel.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, Israel is not only, however, a friend and ally for us, it is a beacon of what democracy can and should mean. It is, after all, a pluralistic democracy. It is, as many of us know from personal experiences, a very dynamic democracy with many points of view, and those are expressed with great frequency and vigor.

So if people in the Middle East are not sure what democracy means, let them look to Israel which has been and remains a true, faithful democracy.

(APPLAUSE)

But we know that the goal, the important, essential goal, of a democratizing Middle East is complex and it is not without risks.

A few months ago I went for the second time to Iraq and Kuwait and Afghanistan and Pakistan, and I returned home with hopefulness about what I had seen and learned, but also with a sense of caution about how we should proceed.

In Iraq, I saw firsthand the daily challenges confronting the Iraqi people. I met with a number of our troops, the brave young men and women who are on freedom's front lines in Iraq.

(APPLAUSE)

I met with our civilian representatives in the embassy and other agencies who are also risking their lives to help the Iraqi people.

And I met with representatives of the former interim Iraqi government and the newly elected Iraqi government, as well as private Iraqi citizens.

Now, I came away with several overwhelming impressions.

First, no matter what one thinks about events that have unfolded in Iraq, there is no doubt that the American military has performed admirably, with professionalism, and that every young man and woman who wears the uniform of our country deserves our support, whether they be active duty, Guard or Reserve troops.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, it is on trips like that, despite the often dangerous circumstances, I wish I could bring every one of my constituents, all 19 million of them and any others who could come, to see firsthand.

I flew from Baghdad to Fallujah in a Blackhawk helicopter, met with the Marines who had liberated Fallujah from the insurgents and terrorists.

CLINTON: I met with many others of our Marines and soldiers who are committed to their mission, to try to bring freedom to the people of Iraq.

They, as well as the troops I saw in Kuwait and in Afghanistan, are committed to this fundamental belief that people deserve the right to be free, deserve the right to select their own governments, deserve the right to plot and plan for a better future for themselves and their children.

I hope that each of you, as you travel through your states and communities, will make it a point to thank these young people, because they're paying a very high price. 1,600 plus lost their lives. Thousands and thousands have returned home grievously injured.

Because of the advances in battlefield medicine and the new body armor that our troops wear, many are surviving injuries that would have left previous generations of young men and women dead.

So there is no doubt that America has started down a path with blood and treasure, to try to create the conditions for democracy and freedom in the Middle East, which has consequences for the entire region, for our security, and certainly for Israel's.

At this critical time in this complicated situation we find ourselves in, I think it's important to recognize the extraordinary stand that Prime Minister Sharon and the democratically elected government of Israel have taken. As they...

(APPLAUSE)

As they face the risks and challenges of disengagement, and as they try to deal with the newly elected Palestinian leadership, the prime minister, whom, I'm pleased to note, will follow me to this stage, and the state of Israel that he has devoted his entire life to serving...

(APPLAUSE)

... are taking a tremendous risk.

I believe it is our obligation, as friends and supporters and allies of Israel, to support Israel's efforts for peace, stability and security.

Now, this means doing more than providing Israel with economic aid so that it can remain strong in the face of ongoing threats.

CLINTON: We must also demand that President Abbas dismantle the structures of terror that the Palestinian leadership has employed for so long.

(APPLAUSE)

In a democracy, even a fledgling democracy, leaders must be held accountable. And President Abbas must be held accountable for the actions taking place under his leadership.

(APPLAUSE)

I know that you are asking your senators and representatives to sign on to a letter to President Bush about this, and I'm proud to support these efforts, because...

(APPLAUSE)

... there can be no doubt that, as Israel and its democratic government take these steps, and we support them, there has to be reciprocity on the other side as well.

And making progress toward peace and security also requires the end of the barrage of hate and incitement that is still officially sanctioned by the Palestinian Authority.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, I was relieved to learn, this week, that the Palestinian Authority removed "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion" from its Web site.

(APPLAUSE)

Reportedly, it had been included on the Web site under the heading, "History of Zionism." But what was it doing there in the first place, even though we are relieved that it is no longer there?

(APPLAUSE)

We must continue to be vigilant about monitoring hate and incitement and anti-Semitism, not only by the Palestinian Authority, but throughout the Arab world.

Saudi textbooks characterize Jews as wicked. Iranian news reports, obviously representing the opinion of their government, have lent credence to Holocaust deniers.

CLINTON: This is an issue that all of us need to be concerned about. And five years ago, I stood with my friend, Eli Weisel, to denounce this incitement, this violence, this anti-Semitism, in Palestinian textbooks.

And I've been working on this issue because, to me, it is one of those basic issues that -- how do we expect to have a democratically elected Palestinian government if their textbooks are still preaching such hatred and if we allow this...

(APPLAUSE)

... dehumanizing rhetoric to go unchallenged? Because what is happening is, young minds are being infected with this anti-Semitism. And that is going to run counter to what we hope can happen over the next years as we do work for peace and stability.

So we must continue to shine a bright spotlight on these messages of hatred and these enticements for martyrdom in these textbooks and on the media that take young minds and twist and pervert them and create a new generation of terrorists and insurgents.

About a year and a half ago, I held a hearing, with Senator Specter, on the Palestinian media. And I confronted the Palestinian Authority representative about this issue, whom we had invited to come and address the Senate committee.

I urged him to acknowledge that, when it comes to children, whoever those children are, shielding them from hate and violence should be the number one priority of their families and their governments and the entire global community, to prevent this hatred from festering.

(APPLAUSE)

Using children as pawns in a political process is tantamount to child abuse, and we must say, "It has to end now."

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: And, of course, that infection is contagious and it can spread beyond the Palestinian territories, it can spread into other parts of the Arab world, and it can impact what goes on there.

And, of course, one of the areas I am deeply concerned about is Iran and its pursuit of nuclear weapons, because a nuclear-armed Iran would shake the foundation of global security to its very core.

Israel would be most immediately and profoundly threatened by this development, but Israel would not be alone. Knowing of Iran's historic and present ties to terrorist networks, how would we feel here in America if the Iranians could start producing nuclear weapons at will? How would the Europeans feel if Iran could start producing nuclear weapons at will?

(APPLAUSE)

So let us be unequivocally clear: A nuclear-armed Iran is unacceptable, but it is not just unacceptable to Israel and to the United States. It must be unacceptable to the entire world, starting with the European governments and people.

(APPLAUSE)

I know that during your conference and in the lobbying that you will be doing on Capitol Hill you're trying to draw attention to the threat that is posed by a nuclear Iran. And I commend you for these efforts. This is one of our most serious security and foreign policy priorities.

And we need to make working with our allies to prevent an Iranian nuclear weapon a top priority.

Now, one of the terrorist groups that Iran supports is Hezbollah. And we know that Hezbollah poses a direct and dire risk to the stability of the Middle East. Syria's withdrawal from Lebanon, which is very good news for the Lebanese people, also creates an opportunity for Hezbollah to wreck havoc.

So we need to remain vigilant about the terrorist threat and work to stop the flow of support to Hezbollah from Syria and Iran. And we need to convince our European allies of Hezbollah's threat to order in the region and to the civilized world, and convince them to designate Hezbollah as a terrorist organization.

(APPLAUSE)

And the Europeans must do more to cut off the funding and the fund-raising that goes on in Europe for Hezbollah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad as soon as possible.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Now, there are many other important and pressing issues that must be on our agenda, but I know that, as you travel to the Hill to meet with your representatives and senators, you will be presenting a very thoughtful and compelling analysis of these and other challenges we face.

I thank you for not only being willing to stand up for our values and our relationship with Israel, but also to take your responsibilities as citizens seriously, to lobby and to advocate, to persuade and to dissuade, to discuss these critical issues with all who will listen.

We are living at an extraordinary moment in history. There are some days when I am very optimistic. And there are other days, I have to confess, when I'm pessimistic. I guess that just goes with the territory.

But what I am absolutely convinced of is that our common values, values shared and exemplified by our country and by Israel, are the right values, the values that everyone should have an opportunity to be exposed to and to understand and, hopefully, to emulate.

There is no other option in the world that, as Tom Friedman said, has been flattened. We can communicate with each other, we can be transported over long distances quickly, we can follow events in other places far away, and therefore we need to recognize that our ongoing struggle for freedom and democracy is the only way that we can ensure that, in this shrinking, flattened world, our children will have a chance for peace and security.

We cannot shrink from the duties that this time has imposed upon us. We can have -- and we should -- great debate and discussions about what are the best ways to proceed and to pursue these common objectives.

We need that. We need that debate and discussion, because we are in uncharted territory. No one has all the answers. And we need the combined intelligence and good ideas of as many people as possible.

So what you are doing today is not only on behalf of AIPAC, not only on behalf of Israel, not only on behalf of the strong and enduring relationship between the United States and Israel; it is truly on behalf of the kind of world we want for our children and, for those lucky enough, grandchildren.

CLINTON: And we can not grow weary. This is a long, arduous path. Israel, Israelis, the American Jewish community and the broader Diaspora know about this struggle and this path better than most.

So if we resolve not to grow weary but to pursue these values together, I am ultimately not only optimistic but confident that the world will see a better and brighter day. And our children will thank us for making it possible.

Thank you all very much.

God bless you.

(APPLAUSE)

"Inside Politics," CNN, 5/26/2005

WOODRUFF: Thank you for joining us.

Few would argue that Hillary Rodham Clinton is a compelling public figure. One of the many reasons for that, the unprecedented possibility that the former first lady might return to the White House as president.

Our just released poll shows that 53 percent of Americans say they are at least somewhat likely to vote for Senator Clinton for president in 2008. That is an 11 point increase from two years ago.

I talked at length with Senator Clinton today about her future and political challenges right now. I started by asking her whether Democrats really got that much out of the deal that ended the Senate showdown over judges.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON, (D) NEW YORK: From the perspective of the institution of the Senate and our system of checks and balances and respect for the constitution and separation of powers, all of these very fundamental principles that we have operated under as a nation for so many centuries now, I think we have. I think it was a very good moment for the Senate as a whole when the 14 senators made that agreement.

Now, obviously, there are some very unfortunate side effects of any agreement. Usually when you have a compromise, which this was, it doesn't satisfy anybody 100 percent. And we will probably see the confirmation of people who are very extreme. And I regret that.

WOODRUFF: Some people have noted that you chose not to be part of the group that announced the compromise, that worked on the compromise. The gang of 14. Should somebody make anything of that?

CLINTON: No. I think that this was a process that a couple of my colleagues started, you know, some weeks ago after Senator Reid could not reach any understanding with Senator Frist. And I thought they were pursuing a noble effort. I didn't know whether they would be successful or not, but I was, you know, certainly supportive of their efforts to try.

I was ambivalent about what the right thing for the country was. I believed, or at least maybe I hoped, that if the trigger were pulled, there would be six Republican senators who, in the tradition of profiles and courage -- Margaret Chase Smith standing up against McCarthy, others take lonely but very important stands on behalf of the constitution and the institution of the Senate -- that there would be those six Republicans. And I'm not sure there wouldn't have been. We will not know now, obviously.

WOODRUFF: Very different subject, Iraq. Record numbers of Americans continue to die in Iraq. No end to the violence in sight that most people can see. When should the United States begin significant troop withdrawals?

CLINTON: Well, there's a preliminary question to that. And the preliminary question is, when will the United States have a strategy that can gain the confidence of the Iraqi people, support the new Iraqi government and protect our troops. And we haven't had that.

You know, I am not one who feels comfortable setting exit strategies. We don't know what we're exiting from. We don't know what the situation is moving toward.

I have said on many occasions, I regret deeply the way the president and the civilian leadership at the Pentagon pursued this action in Iraq. I think numerous mistakes were made. And I believe that it is unfortunate that the Congress, under Republican leadership, has been unwilling to hold the kind of oversight hearings that previous Congresses have done.

How do we know where we're headed, when we don't know where we are. And when we don't get anything but, sort of, a chorus of happy talk from the administration.

WOODRUFF: Senator, there is so much I want to cover, and I know we have limited time so I'm going to move quickly through a couple of other things. Tom DeLay, you worked with the House majority leader on a number of issues, including foster care. Now, many of your Democratic colleagues are saying Tom DeLay is ethically challenged. Do you believe he's an honorable man?

CLINTON: You know, I'm not going to talk about someone's character in that way. Really what happens to him depends upon the House. I have serious disagreements with him politically. I think he is leading the country in the wrong direction. I think his political philosophy is bad for America. I think the decisions that he has made and the way in which he has stifled dissent and run roughshod over democracy with a small d in the House is very bad for America.

So, on political grounds and on policy grounds, I think that his leadership has been unfortunate not only for the House of Representatives, but for the country.

WOODRUFF: Let's talk about you for a moment. Your former -- your old friend, former Georgia Democratic Senator Zell Miller has written in his new book that you just might be elected president in '08. He says because she will position herself much closer to the middle than anybody could have imagined. What do you say to Zell Miller?

CLINTON: Well, I appreciate that. You know, he and his wife Shirley have been my friends for a very long time. And as with friends, we don't always agree on everything, obviously.

But I have a very deep affection for him and his wife. And I take it as high praise, because I have tried very hard in these years in the Senate to, you know, seek out common ground and to look for solutions to problems. And not to turn everything into a partisan wrangle. And not give into the extremes. And I don't care where they're coming from, I think that's bad for our country.

WOODRUFF: Speaking of that, Democrats as we know, were hurt last November in some places on the so-called social issues. Let me ask you about -- you talked about the need for Democrats to do a better job of talking about cultural issues. For example, you said abortion should be as rare as possible.

And yet when it comes to a Supreme Court nominee, Democrats are talking principally about abortion rights instead of affirmative action or social safety net. Is that a mistake for the Democrats?

CLINTON: well, I don't know which Democrats you're talking about, because I'm not. I've given a couple of speeches over the last four years raising concerns about the judicial activism of the Supreme Court. You know, that's not talked about enough.

But this Supreme Court has reversed more legislation enacted by the elected representatives of the people than any other Supreme Court in recent years. And so I'm concerned about judicial activism that really undertakes an effort to turn back the clock on the progress of the 20th Century.

(END VIDEOTAPE) WOODRUFF: Part one of the interview. As one of the nation's most prominent Democrats, Hillary Clinton is keenly aware of the party's successes and mistakes.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLINTON: We may not have done as good a job perhaps in communicating and connecting with people, but that doesn't change the facts of what we stand for.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WOODRUFF: Still ahead, Senator Clinton on where Democrats are headed and what she may do in 2008.

Also ahead, a new verdict in Texas in the possible political fallout for House Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

And later, is the stem cell research debate driving a wedge among Republicans?

WOODRUFF: Many political observers say they believe Hillary Rodham Clinton has tacked to the center since becoming a senator. But our new poll shows that 54 percent of Americans would peg Senator Clinton as a liberal. 30 percent say they see her as a moderate.

During our interview today, I asked Senator Clinton about efforts to moderate her party's stand on abortion, and she insisted Democrats no longer need to be on the defensive on that issue.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CLINTON: I think our goal is to reduce, as low as possible, the number of unwanted pregnancies, to try to help young women and young men make responsible decisions, to be there with adoption as an alternative for young women who do proceed with their pregnancy, to talk sensibly about providing emergency contraception after a woman's been raped. You know, I think that on the overriding goal of whether or not we want to criminalize abortion, criminalize women, criminalize their doctors, a vast majority of Americans say no.

But I think there is a very strong feeling that we should work together to try to create better conditions to reduce abortions. And I would just add that during the Clinton administration, abortions went down. And they've gone back up under the Bush administration. So clearly, what is being done by the current policies are not necessarily working.

WOODRUFF: Similarly, on the question of gay rights, aren't Democrats always going to be on the defensive? You now have 11 states that ban gay marriage. Should Democrats think about changing their position?

CLINTON: Well, I don't know many Democrats who support gay marriage. In fact, I don't and haven't for, you know, years before I became a senator. But I support giving people the right to enter into recognized relationships, that whether you call him civil unions or domestic partnerships, enable them to own property, to have hospital visitation. To me, that's a human rights issue.

Maybe I have just known more people than some of my colleagues, have because I've been blessed to know thousands of thousands of wonderful, patriotic, decent Americans, some of whom have committed relationships to their partners and who have suffered because when one was sick, they couldn't have that person by their bedside. I don't think that's right.

WOODRUFF: A lot of people give -- more broadly -- the Republicans credit for giving a narrative that they can say in just a few sentences. And criticize the Democrats for so often sounding like a string of policy statements from different interest groups. What, to you, in just two or three sentences, should be the narrative for the Democratic party?

CLINTON: Well, the Democratic party is responsible for most of the progress of the 20th century. It is the Democratic party that fought and stood for democracy and freedom. It is the Democratic party that created the ladders of opportunity that enabled millions of people to lift themselves into the middle class and fulfill their God-given potential. And it is the Democratic party that battered down the obstacles that stood in the way of women and minorities and others, having the opportunity to fully participate in American life.

And I think that if you really look at narrative of the 20th century, we're on the side of the continuing progress on behalf of the American people, and of America's leadership in an effective way at home and around the world. And the Republicans' narrative is really one that wants to turn the clock back. I think our narrative is better. We may not have done as good a job, perhaps, in communicating it and connecting with people, but that doesn't change the facts of what we stand for.

WOODRUFF: Three other quick things. 2006, you're running for re-election?

CLINTON: I sure am.

WOODRUFF: To the United States Senate. Ed Cox has formed an exploratory committee, Republican attorney. He's already saying New Yorkers deserve a senator who is committed to New York and only to New York. If you were asked to pledge, at some point between now and next year, whether you will definitely fill out a six-year term in the Senate, what would you say?

CLINTON: I am focused on winning re-election. That is what I work on every single day, just as I have worked my heart out for the last four years. I think that many people in New York know how hard I've worked. Obviously dealing with 9/11 was a horrific experience and responsibility. I've tried to work throughout the state. I've tried to bring people together from upstate and downstate and from one end to the other. And I'm going to continue doing that every day, and I'm not going to get diverted. I'm going to stay focused on what my job is as the senator from New York.

WOODRUFF: '08. When do you have to make a decision?

CLINTON: Oh, I'm not even, you know, remotely considering that. My view is that, you know, life unfolds at its own rhythm. You know, I have never lived a life that I thought I could plan out. And I'm just trying to do the best I can every day. I find I have a lot to get done between the time I get up and the time I go to bed. And obviously, it's, you know, it's very flattering, I guess, for people to feel that way, and I appreciate it.

But, you know, I'm focused on '06. I'm trying to do the best job I can. I care deeply about these issues that we're fighting out here in the Senate, which I think are going to determine what kind of country we're going to have.

HANNAH STORM, co-host:

Republican Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and Democratic Senator Hillary Clinton are normally adversaries on, well, just about everything. But today they're coming together to announce a new bipartisan health-care initiative.

Senator Frist and Senator Clinton, good morning to both of you.

Senator BILL FRIST (Majority Leader): Good morning.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning.

STORM: Senator Frist, right before we start, though, I do want to address the big headline today. You were so instrumental in efforts to involve Congress in the Terri Schiavo case and keeping her alive, and, as you know, the autopsy findings were released that she did have massive irreversible brain damage. What was your reaction?

Sen. FRIST: Well, I think, I haven't seen the report itself, but I believe it does bring a very sad chapter to a close. We all knew that she had devastating brain damage. This was documented today. We feel for the family. We know there was a lot of discussion and a lot of media attention, and hopefully this brings this to a close. The diagnosis they made is exactly right; it's the pathology. Respect that, and I think it's now time to move on.

STORM: All right. Senator Clinton, it's nice to see the two of you on the same page here with something, as you come together for this very important health information technology legislation. For average Americans, how is this going to change and improve their health care?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, we believe it's going to be a dramatic change. And here's what it will do. It will create an electronic medical record that is secure and confidential for every American. It will provide immediate access to important health-care information to physicians treating you, to nurses who are looking after you, to hospitals and nursing homes who are taking care of you. And it will enable your doctor in New York to talk to a doctor in Tennessee, if you were to travel from New York to Tennessee and need medical assistance.

And it will cut the time and the mistakes that unfortunately get made because people don't have accurate information at their fingertips. And lower the cost of health care because we won't need to be duplicating tests and doing thing over. We'll have all the information in one place.

STORM: Senator Frist, it's interesting that you are coming together. It's been such a divisive climate in the Senate. Why cooperate on this issue in particular?

Sen. FRIST: Well, Hannah, this gives us a great opportunity. I think it's demonstrated by the two of us being here today that we're in a world today with miracles in medicine, whether it's the heart transplants that I have done in the past or just delivering a baby today with all the technology available. Yet in spite of that, we have huge inefficiencies in the health-care system that diminish the quality of care, that mean more medical mistakes are made and at the same time drive up the cost of health care for everybody listening to us today.

Thus, we're going to hit it head on in a nonpartisan way over the next 18 months, working with the administration, bipartisan way in the Congress, to establish a technology system of health information that will empower patients, consumers, you and everybody, to get information that they can use. And, at the same time, as Senator Clinton just said, allow the 900,000 doctors out there to communicate one with another with the 6,000 hospitals and 4,000 community health centers, none of whom communicate one to another today electronically. It will lower the cost. It will reduce the mistakes that are being made and drive up the quality of health care.

STORM: Senator Clinton, American citizens would really like to see more of this type of cooperation and action in the Congress. A recent Gallup Poll showed that 59 percent of American citizens--That's such a high number--disapprove of Congress' performance. The president is getting frustrated. He said this week, lashing out at the Democrats, that they were delaying solutions and obstructing progress, and what's your reaction to that?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think, this is a perfect example of what we can do when we do work together. Senator Frist and I started talking about this issue over a year ago. We have been working steadily toward the introduction of this legislation. And we really see this as not only an important piece of legislation that will improve the quality of our health-care system and decrease costs, but as an example of coming together to solve a problem that we have to address as a nation. So, whenever there are opportunities to work together, I know that we're going to try to do that because, you know, I agree with some of the frustration that Americans feel. We have real challenges confronting us. This is one of them, but there are so many more, and we do need to try to find solutions.

STORM: And, Senator Frist, speaking of solutions, many have accused the Senate of playing party politics here with this John Bolton nomination as ambassador to the UN. Are you going to try for a vote on that again today, and what is the future of that nomination? How can the two parties come together? The Democrats say they want information that the Republicans aren't giving.

Sen. FRIST: Well, I think, that we will come together. I think if you look what we're doing on the floor of the Senate today, we'll go over and work on energy policy, and I expect we'll pass that in a strong bipartisan way after a lot of debate and amendment over the next week and a half. We're passing a highway bill over the course of the next week and a half.

We've already done it in the Senate, again working together. Our being here today on what I believe is the number one problem addressing the country domestically today, and that is the cost of health care--the fact that the two of us are on your show today. There can always be issues, whether it's the judges or whether it is John Bolton's nomination, that there is going to be a contrast of ideas. We take that to the floor. We ultimately, just like with judges, work it out. It's tough. It's messy. It looks chaotic, but ultimately we get to a solution. And we hopefully will be able to--well, if the president's nominated John Bolton; we'll take it to the floor. We'll see whether or not he has the votes and, if so, he'll be confirmed. I don't know whether we'll be voting on it today or not, but in the very near future.

STORM: All right. Senator Frist, Senator Clinton, nice to see the two of you together. Thanks.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you, Hannah.

Sen. FRIST: Thank you. Good to be with you, Hannah.

STORM: Now to Rene and Russ.

RENE SYLER (Co-host): All right. Hannah, thanks.

Up next, we're going to have the latest on that missing American teen-ager in Aruba, including a new hunt for clues. This is after authorities conducted a second search of one of the suspect's home yesterday.

RUSS MITCHELL (Co-host): And later, we'll have safety tips for parents before your kids get on those wild amusement park rides this summer.

This is THE EARLY SHOW on CBS.

(Announcements)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON IRAQ ISSUES, 6/23/2005

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, gentlemen, for being here and thank you for your service under very difficult circumstances.

I think that one of the challenges we face in our country, as well as in the Congress, is that there are grounds for reasonable disagreements about how we pursue our goals in Iraq and elsewhere.

I absolutely agree that our enemy, our violent, nihilistic extremists -- I agree that if we and the Iraqi people and their government are successful in Iraq, it will be a transformative historic event.

I think it's also fair to point out that there are great risks and dangers associated with this strategy and that the young men and women who wear the uniform of our country are put in harm's way every day. And I know how heavily that weighs on all of us, those of you that command them and those of us who vote to send them there and vote to try to provide the resources that they need

So while there might be reasonable disagreements about how we pursue our goals, I hope, Mr. Secretary, you would agree that Democrats and Republicans, people of every political belief and not at all, united after the 9/11 attacks on our nation. And that has been especially evident here in this Senate Armed Services Committee under the bipartisan leadership of Chairman Warner and Ranking Member Levin.

Mr. Secretary, would you agree with that statement?

RUMSFELD: Senator, there's no question but that the country and the Congress united after September 11th.

CLINTON: Mr. Secretary, I want to read you a quote from today's newspaper.

"Conservatives saw the savagery of 9/11 and the attacks and prepared for war; Liberals saw the savagery of the 9/11 attacks and wanted to prepare indictments and offer therapy and understanding for our attackers."

Mr. Secretary, do you agree with that statement by a senior member of this administration?

RUMSFELD: I don't know who made the statement or the context of it, and I've just gotten through saying that when one takes a single sentence or a single comment out of a longer statement that may have context, I find frequently that it is harmful.

And I don't know who said it or what the context was, and, obviously, it's not something I said.

CLINTON: I appreciate that.

Well, it is a statement by Karl Rove, and it is the kind of statement that is particularly harmful and painful. It is the kind of statement that is unnecessary. It is the kind of statement that pits Americans of good faith seeking to support the men and women in uniform, seeking to protect them, seeking to support you, despite the fact that we might have serious questions and even disagreements about strategy and tactics.

And so it politicizes and turns into a partisan game, something as serious as the attack on our nation on September 11th and something as deadly as the conflict in which we are currently engaged.

So I would hope, Mr. Secretary, that you and other members of the administration would immediately repudiate such an insulting comment from a high-ranking official in the president's inner circle.

You know, it is very disturbing to many of us, increasingly so, that we cannot have a national conversation about something as important as the conflict that we face, which I, for one, believe is a long-term challenge to our very existence, and it's certainly a challenge that you're attempting to deal with in the field and in the Pentagon.

And it is not just people on one side of the aisle who have raised these issues. A recent bipartisan group of members of Congress called for an end of the conflict, a withdrawal of our troops, something I don't agree with, but I understand the frustration and the concern and anxiety that motivates such a statement and question.

And I would not in any way question the resolve, the toughness, the patriotism of anybody who raises legitimate questions and has disagreements about how we are to pursue our objectives.

And with due respect, I think it would be helpful if we would hear a little bit more of that tone from our president and from our vice president and from our other high-ranking officials in the administration.

I'm old enough to remember how deeply divided our country was in Vietnam. I never want to see that again.

We may have disagreements about how to engage in this conflict and how to win it, but I never want to live through that again, and I don't think any of us do.

So I would respectfully suggest that perhaps we adopt a somewhat different tone and approach in discussing these very critical matters for the benefit of all of us, and particularly the benefit of the young men and women who we're so proud of and so grateful to for their sacrifice.

RUMSFELD: Senator, I certainly agree. I think you'll find the tone in my remarks fit what you're talking about. I think that it is unfortunate when things become so polarized or so politicized, and you've heard some of that here today. It isn't helpful.

In my remarks, I pointed out that there are a number of questions that are raised by the public, by members of the House and the Senate, and that's a perfectly proper and legitimate thing to do.

Our democracy permits that. We can live through it in a wartime period if we do it in an orderly way and a sensible way and civil way.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON GUANTANAMO BAY DETAINEE
TREATMENT, 7/13/2005

COMMITTEE: SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I don't know where to begin.

General Craddock, was it any member of the Al Qaida or Taliban who took pictures of these interrogations, techniques and thereby revealed them to the world?

CRADDOCK: I'm not aware of Al Qaida or Taliban taking pictures of interrogations at -- oh, you're talking about for their manual.

CLINTON: No. The discussion about how these interrogation techniques became public and who knew about them and what kind of information that might give to the prisoners to resist interrogation, in fact, these techniques became public because of actions and decisions made by members of the United States military. Isn't that correct?

CRADDOCK: Not that I'm aware of.

CLINTON: Well, think of Abu Ghraib. And think of the pictures that were published that were taken by members of military police units and others inside that prison. Isn't that what happened?

CRADDOCK: Senator, those were not interrogations.

CLINTON: No, but they led to the inquiry about interrogations, did they not?

CRADDOCK: The timing on these techniques we talked about today, the applications, the Joint Task Force Guantanamo applications of the techniques, preceded those pictures.

CLINTON: I guess my point, General, is that as we look at what our real goal here is, our goal is to be effective in interrogation in order to obtain information in order to deter attacks and in order to find out significant intelligence that will enable us to defeat this enemy. Isn't that right?

CRADDOCK: I agree.

CLINTON: So I think it's important to put in the record that at least for some of us, at least speaking for myself, my concern about this is driven primarily about how effective we are going to be.

And there is considerable evidence that the underlying techniques, as well as the publicity about those techniques, which did not come from the enemy that we were interrogating but from people on the inside within our own military is really what should be the focus here, that if these techniques were so effective, why didn't we get better information? Why do we still have people who have been resistant? And especially in Guantanamo, where they have been basically out of communication for three years.

So I think that the intensity behind some of the questioning that you have received really begins from a fundamental disagreement about how we can be effective in pursuing the objectives that we all agree are the ones that are most important.

CLINTON: And, at least from my perspective, I think that we made serious errors in authorizing and permitting a number of these techniques -- because they were not effective.

And, in a free society, which we still are, it is very difficult to keep such behavior totally private. So, at some point, they were going to be revealed and disclosed, as the log about detainee 063 has been revealed and disclosed.

So I guess, General, you know, the questions that many of us have are really about the underlying attitude that has been taken toward this series of investigations that have been carried out.

And our belief that we haven't done all we should to be as effective as we need to be, and the failure of accountability, leads to ineffectiveness.

General Schmidt and General Furlow, let me ask you: Your report indicates that several past interrogators at Guantanamo Bay declined to be interviewed and are currently in civilian status.

How many of the FBI's allegations of aggressive interrogators involved former interrogators who declined to be interviewed?

FURLOW: Sir -- excuse me, ma'am -- on the FBI side, none of the FBI agents refused to be interviewed. And the reason why we were not able to talk to the individuals that had prior experience down there was that we do not have subpoena capability under the A.R. 15-6, which was an administrative investigation. And that's what limited it.

If the person was still currently serving in the military, we could force them to visit with us. If they had served their time in Guantanamo and returned to civilian life as a reservist, we were not able to subpoena them and force them to visit with us.

CLINTON: And how many people were you unable to subpoena or force to visit with you?

FURLOW: Ma'am, we felt that there was not anybody that was material to this case.

CLINTON: How many, though, were you unable to visit with or subpoena?

FURLOW: I'd say less than 10.

CLINTON: General, is that your recollection?

SCHMIDT: Yes, ma'am. It was very, very few. Those that we could not get to that were relevant to our investigation was just a small amount. Principally, it involved one that involved the death threat, in a ruse that we found out about in an interrogation. That was the one that concerned us the most.

CLINTON: And wasn't there also a former interrogator who wrote a book about his experiences?

SCHMIDT: That's correct. You're referring to Sergeant Eric Sarr. He was on his way to make a documentary. We asked if he had seen things, would he like to air that? Would he like them investigated? He declined to be interviewed by us repeatedly.

CRADDOCK: Senator, let me set the record straight. He was not an interrogator. He was a translator, a linguist.

CLINTON: Well, as a translator/linguist, he would have been, perhaps, accompanying interrogators and therefore a witness, would he not?

CRADDOCK: He participated in one or two interrogations that we can establish as a linguist.

CLINTON: Well, General Craddock, I just hope that at some point we can clear the air on these matters because I think we need to. And whatever revisions need to be made in the field manual or the Geneva Conventions, the United States ought to be a leader in that. And we ought to do so both because that's what we believe and the kind of people we are, and also because we want to be effective.

There's a lot at stake. And, you know, it doesn't inspire confidence when we have all of these unanswered questions and when General Miller, who we know, went from Guantanamo to Iraq and was told to Gitmo-ize Abu Ghraib, is basically the central figure in both of these investigations and yet, once again, is free of any accountability or any admonishment. It raises serious questions.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

DEMOCRATIC WOMEN SENATORS HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON THE NOMINATION OF JUDGE JOHN ROBERTS TO THE SUPREME COURT, 7/28/2005

CLINTON: Well, I'm just very pleased to be here with my colleagues under Senator Mikulski's leadership.

CLINTON: This is an extraordinarily innovative way of creating an opportunity for people around the country to be part of this process.

Democracy started in small groups and in town hall meetings, gatherings in our nation where people could look each other in the eye. And obviously, over the last 225 years, we can't do that anymore. We're too big, we're too complex.

But, thanks to the miracle of modern communications, we have an opportunity to include people and give them a chance to participate.

And we're very hopeful that this will elicit a tremendous outpouring of responses. We will do our best to make sure that these questions get to our colleagues on the Judiciary Committee. We will be passing them on to those who are managing this nomination for the White House, because it is not just us who are asking the questions. It is the American people.

And there are so many important issues at stake. And this nominee, like all nominees, has to provide answers that give the American people some insight into what he will do with a totally unaccountable, unreviewable position on the United States Supreme Court for decades to come.

So I'm delighted to be here and be part of this and look forward to the questions that will come to our Web sites.

MIKULSKI: Are there any questions?

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, I was wondering if you'd tell me when you're going to be meeting with Judge Roberts and what he's going to have to do during that meeting (OFF-MIKE)?

CLINTON: Well, I am going to be meeting with him later today. And I am waiting to see the process unfold. I haven't made any decision about how I intend to vote.

I consider this one of the most important responsibilities I have as a United States senator, something that's explicitly mentioned in the United States Constitution. I take it very seriously.

So I'm going to be watching and listening and gathering information. And my opinion will be, obviously, influenced by what I learn.

MIKULSKI: Any other questions?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) Judge Roberts comes before the committee and he says that he thinks that Roe v. Wade was wrongly settled, do any of you hold open the possibility that, if he says that, that you can still vote in favor of his nomination?

(CROSSTALK)

BOXER: I think that Maria Cantwell put this in the context of privacy rights. If he says that, then you must probe. If he says he thinks Roe v. Wade was wrongly decided, we all know that case emanated from Griswold. So then you've got to say: Well, did you think Griswold was wrongly decided -- and probe that.

And it's a bigger question, but it is to me -- I only speak for myself -- a very ominous sign on his view on privacy. And I just wanted to lay something out here on the table. This is really important. This latest poll that just came out: Should Senate support or oppose Roberts based on qualifications or also other issues?

BOXER: On qualifications, 36 percent say that's the only issue. 56 percent say his view on the issues.

So it is extremely important. And in this particular poll, 65 percent agree with Roe.

So I think, if you put that together, I think anyone who doesn't view the right of privacy in a positive light is going to be in trouble, because the American people -- as far as I know, if you ask them a blank slate, "what's your most important right," they'll list privacy right up there at the top.

QUESTION: But it's not an absolute (OFF-MIKE)?

BOXER: Well for me, I would say someone who wants to overturn Roe does not respect the right of privacy. And I would have a very difficult time -- an impossible time, frankly -- voting for someone who doesn't respect the privacy of half the population.

So you can...

(CROSSTALK)

MIKULSKI: What Senator Boxer is saying -- and we're all saying -- is that we're not a single-issue group. We're deeply concerned about the right of privacy, the right to protect the environment, people with disability, to address grievances in a nonviolent way.

But what Senator Boxer said is what many of us hold. Senator Cantwell has spoken as well on privacy.

If you believe that Roe v. Wade should be overturned, then what other privacy cases do you want to overturn? Do you want to overturn the Griswold case which occurred in Connecticut in which married couples were forbidden or not allowed to buy contraceptives?

What should the United States Supreme Court be doing in the bedroom of married couples?

Then this takes us to other issues. What is the access to financial records, to medical records? It will take us into the Patriot Act. It takes us into issues between privacy and national security.

So we feel very strongly, but Roe and Griswold have always been the anchor to that. And, quite frankly, for me, it would be very troubling if he said that.

QUESTION: Senator Mikulski, (OFF-MIKE) recommends Senator Feinstein. (OFF-MIKE)?

MIKULSKI: Senator Feinstein is very favorably disposed to this group. She wants to have the questions asked.

MIKULSKI: But, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, she didn't want to participate in the press conference -- but she sure wants to hear the questions that are going to come through the Web site.

QUESTION: I direct my colleague's question more specifically to Senator Clinton about Roe. (OFF-MIKE) said, "I believe Roe was wrongly decided," would that be someone you feel you could vote for for confirmation?

CLINTON: You know, I'm going to wait and hear the answer in the Judiciary Committee. I share the concerns of my colleagues. I want to see what the nominee says. We're speculating. I'm not going to be speculating. I want to hear what he says. I want to see the facts of the evidence. I want to see more documents. And then we'll go from there.

MIKULSKI: Well, I think it's time now -- excuse me. Congress can hold up, yes.

QUESTION: Just one more on Senator Feinstein. With just one woman on the committee, to what degree do you all expect or want her to be kind of an emissary for (OFF-MIKE) women?

MIKULSKI: Well, Senator Feinstein, as you know, speaks in her own voice. But what we do know is that the members of the Judiciary Committee, particularly our side of the aisle, intend to raise these issues as well.

They are very supportive of our Web site. They think it's creative. They think it's ingenious. A wonderful way to provide access to the process in a way that will be almost reinvigorating to the process.

So it doesn't all fall to Feinstein. It falls to every member of that Judiciary Committee to ask probing questions -- because this is a lifetime appointment and could shape the 21st century in the history of the Supreme Court.

LANDRIEU: I can't wait for the picture to be shown on national television consistently throughout the hearings. We just lost 50 percent of the number of women that were on the Supreme Court, and now we'll see a judiciary room of a group of men and one woman deciding a very important issue.

So yes, she will be speaking loud and clear and so will that picture.

MIKULSKI: And so will we. With that, we end the questions.

Thank you very much.

END

"On the Record with Greta Van Susteren," FOX, 9/5/2005

VAN SUSTEREN: We had lots of visitors today in Houston, including two former presidents of the United States and several members of Congress, including Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, whose own state went through September 11 and had much damage and heartache. Let's listen to the interview.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

So Senator, what's the advice -- your state, New York, has gone through this hell. What's your advice for both Houston (INAUDIBLE) a lot of this problem, and Louisiana, and Mississippi and Alabama?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, obviously, I'm here in part because America was so generous to New York after 9/11, and we had enormous help both from the federal government, as well as from private individuals, corporations. Everybody chipped in. And our recovery was much more possible because of that.

Now, though, the dimensions of this disaster, the hundreds of thousands of people who are directly and indirectly affected, you know, it means that we're in this for the long term, and I hope everybody understands that. And I'm going to do everything I can when I get back to Washington tomorrow to make sure that the people of New Orleans and the surrounding parishes and up and down the Gulf Coast in Alabama and Mississippi, everybody who's been affected gets the help that they deserve from America.

VAN SUSTEREN: Let me ask you sort of an odd question. What can the media do? I mean, it's, like, you know, we sort of -- we follow this around, but you've been through this in New York, and you know, we have our job. But how can we sort of help the whole process?

CLINTON: Well, I think the media has done a good job over the last seven, eight days. You have brought home to America and the world the enormity of the suffering and loss that has happened. And stay with it. Don't get diverted from this story. This is, you know, something that will take months and years even to define and analyze. And the media can't just go to another story. And maybe now there has been a seriousness of purpose, you know, that really gives the media a chance to, you know, turn away from some of the celebrity stories of the moment.

And let's look at how we're living in America. Let's look at the challenges that people face every day, and then let's be sure that we do everything we can to follow the individuals who are going to be so drastically transformed in this effort.

You know, I think that -- when I look at those pictures -- I've been to New Orleans a lot. I'm familiar with the surrounding area, the parishes up and down the Gulf Coast. I know those people have lots and lots of friends. Living in Arkansas, we used to go, you know, down there all the time. And I just want to be sure that Americans know that we're going to need help for months and years to come. And the media has to help us to remind ourselves of that.

VAN SUSTEREN: How do we avoid disaster fatigue, meaning all of us sort of -- you know, the government, the private givers, the corporations, the media -- how do we avoid getting disaster fatigue and sort of forgetting about this? We all have the enthusiasm right now, you know, let's help these people. I mean, this is not a short-term project. How do we stay on it?

CLINTON: By staying on it and by doing what has been done the last several days, which are sort of the human aspects of this story. You know, let's follow some of the people who have been dislocated from their home. Let's see if they do get jobs. Let's see if they do get help. Let's see if their kids get into school. Let's see if they get the medical care they need.

You know, that to me -- there is no more important issue, and so I hope that both from a civic perspective and, frankly, from a moral perspective, Americans don't get fatigued and the media doesn't get fatigued because we have a lot ahead of us.

VAN SUSTEREN: Any thought on Texas and Houston, how they've done? How have they done?

CLINTON: They've done well.

VAN SUSTEREN: And you know...

CLINTON: They have done really well.

VAN SUSTEREN: I want to tell you, walking through the Astrodome, when people -- when members of Congress show up or even celebrities show up, it's a little bit of an inspiration to these people. It's, like, you know...

CLINTON: You don't want anybody to feel forgotten.

VAN SUSTEREN: No, no. But I'm saying just the walkthrough is huge for everybody.

CLINTON: Well, that's what we're going to go to.

VAN SUSTEREN: Thank you, Senator.

CLINTON: Thanks, Greta.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

VAN SUSTEREN: Jada Pinkett Smith -- she was also here to inspire and to find out how she can help people. She joins us next.

"48 Hours," CBS, 9/6/2005

VAN SANT: (Voiceover) Washington politicians returned today to Capitol Hill and signaled their determination to investigate the disaster along the Gulf Coast.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: Well, we got to help--help you get back into nursing school.

(Footage of Hillary Clinton in shelter)

VAN SANT: (Voiceover) New York Democratic Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton urged the president to restore FEMA to full Cabinet-level status. 48 HOURS correspondent Susan Spencer spoke with the senator today in Washington.

Sen. CLINTON: Money has been taken away from FEMA, functions have been taken away from FEMA, personnel have been cut. It has been cannibalized.

SUSAN SPENCER reporting:

So should Michael Brown be fired?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, you know, I have learned in watching this administration closely now for four years, you're only fired if you tell the truth and if you speak truth to power, so to speak.

SPENCER: Was that "yes"? Was that a "yes"?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think that, you know, this is up to the administration.

SPENCER: You--you can't mean to basically give the state a pass on this or imply that the state did such a bang-up job either, right?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I--I don't think that we should give anybody a pass.

Mr. BROUSSARD: We're going to have the volunteer fire departments go out with bullhorns and announce that food and water and medicine is available at these locations.

(Footage of Broussard talking with aid workers)

“Good Morning America,” ABC, 9/7/2005

(Off Camera) Bob Woodruff reporting from New Orleans this morning. Well, the administration and its response to Katrina has certainly had its share of critics, and prominent among them has been Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. She joins us this morning from Washington.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) Senator, I saw that you called emergency planning under the president a recipe for disaster. Do you hold him to blame for what's happened in, in the Gulf Coast?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON, DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK

Well, I think we need to get to the bottom of what did happen, Charlie. You know, I've called for a commission similar to what we did for 9/11. I'm not interested in, in pointing fingers, I'm interested in getting answers. When I was in Houston on Monday, and meeting with so many of the people who had been evacuated, that's what they wanted. They asked me questions I couldn't answer. They deserve answers. I think all of us in our country deserve answers.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Voice Over) But do we need commissions to do this? Isn't the time for all of that far down the road?

graphics: hurricane katrina

graphics: what went wrong?

CHARLES GIBSON

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Absolutely. Well, that's why I think it needs to be done by an independent commission of experts outside of the government. I don't think the government can investigate itself, and I don't think the government should be distracted from the main job, which is the recovery process that needs to go on. So, I think that having an independent commission actually removes some of the pressure, so that people who are experts in disaster response can begin to look at this while memories are still fresh, while everybody has an idea of what they did or didn't do, but the people responsible mostly in our government, to making sure that the lives that have been so devastated are begun to be put back together can focus on that job which is job number one.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) In your letter to the president, you called for a commission to fully examine Federal response efforts to natural disasters. Why in this case not the city and the state? They're the first responders and they clearly were totally overwhelmed.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

They absolutely were and of course that should be investigated. But on August 27th, the Saturday before the hurricane, the president signed an emergency declaration. What that means legally is that the Federal government took responsibility for coordinating the response. That means coordinating state and local governments. But I'm primarily interested in why, if there was an emergency declaration signed, the Federal government was not more ready, not more able, not more willing to do what needed to be done to help those people who were the first line of defense on the ground throughout the Gulf Coast.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Voice Over) Doesn't Congress -bear a good deal of the blame not only for putting FEMA in the Department of Homeland Security but also for allowing the cuts in funds to fortify those levees year after year?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

That's why I think we need an independent investigation. You know, I have a great deal of respect for my colleagues, Susan Collins and Joe Lieberman, they're beginning an inquiry in their committee. The president has said he's going to look into it. I think that can all be useful. But at the end of the day, just like with 9/11, we need independent experts, we need people with different kinds of experiences to take a hard look at everything that was done. You know, it's been tough these last few years. The primary priority of this administration domestically has been tax cuts, and when tax cuts for the wealthiest people in the country takes priority over everything, you're going to see some, you know, effects of that over the long run. And, you know, Charlie, that's one of my larger concerns, is that, you know, we need to put the American people first. We need to be taking care of the needs that we have to repair and fix our infrastructure, and that's not just a problem for New Orleans, that's a problem for New York, that's a problem for everywhere, and that means we need to be having spending priorities that will protect our country.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) Senator Clinton, good to have you with us. All the best. Thank you.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Thank you, Charlie.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) That interview just before we went on the air, Diane and Robin, and I asked her, given the fact that it's going to cost so much for recovery, and with what we're spending in Iraq, whether or not we're going to have to raise taxes, but you can't get a politician to say definitively we're going to have to raise taxes and so she didn't.

DIANE SAWYER, ABC NEWS

(Off Camera) Well, the president, of course, said to me when I talked to him last week, no tax rises.

ROBIN ROBERTS, ABC NEWS

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) He said you don't want to throw a curve to the economy. So, he's made up his mind about what he thinks has to be done. But I want to say something about what we find on the ground here over and over. Talk about concentration on the needs still, right now, here. Traveling around with the Red Cross yesterday, people said, what do we do about medicine? I can't get insulin. And we tried to help out wherever we could, but it's still ...

ROBIN ROBERTS

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) ... a crisis here of getting medicine. You don't have a prescription, for one thing. And how do you get a prescription?

ROBIN ROBERTS

(Off Camera) And also, the people I talked to, they said it's a blame game going on between the politicians and pointing fingers and this, that and the other. They just want answers. They just want, they have ...

ROBIN ROBERTS

(Off Camera) ... very hard questions and they want just straight answers and they don't feel like they're getting it from either side. But that's something to be determined at a later date, perhaps. But to get the rest of the news headlines, let's go to Claire Shipman who's in Washington, DC. Good morning, Claire.

"The Early Show," CBS, 9/7/2005

Some members of Congress say FEMA needs to be an independent agency again, as it was before 9/11. New York Senator Hillary Clinton, who visited with evacuees from New Orleans at the Astrodome over the weekend, is co-sponsoring a bill to pull FEMA out from under the umbrella of the Department of Homeland Security.

Senator Clinton, good morning.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning, Hannah.

STORM: Well, you've also called for an independent commission to investigate. At the most basic level, what went wrong with the federal response?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, that's what we need to find out. When I was in Houston meeting with so many of our fellow citizens whose lives have been totally turned upside down, they wanted answers to questions. They asked me question after question about what did go wrong. Right now, we have guesses. We're getting some good information from the press, but we don't know. And people not only in New Orleans or the surrounding parishes and in Mississippi and Alabama deserve answers; all of us deserve answers, and so I hope that we will have an independent commission.

The president says he wants to investigate. Obviously, the Congress is going to investigate. I don't think either the president or the Congress can conduct the kind of objective independent investigation that we need.

STORM: The president declared a state of emergency before the hurricane hit, but he, himself, has been directly criticized for his response to the disaster. What could he have done differently?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think it's important you point that out, Hannah. The president did declare a disaster on August 27th, and what that declaration said is that the federal government would coordinate response, and that didn't happen. There were so many problems and the, you know, local and state authorities were overwhelmed by the immensity of this disaster. And the federal government was slow to respond. They didn't really inspire any confidence in the people they were working with. We've seen so many examples of local and state officials saying, 'We thought they were coming. We thought they were coming. They didn't come.' We need to know what went wrong.

Now I've also said, however, that FEMA worked very well during the Clinton administration as an independent agency with someone in charge who actually understood how to respond to emergencies, had a lot of experience. My law that I would propose...

STORM: That brings me to my next question.

Sen. CLINTON: ...would require that be done.

STORM: Right.

Sen. CLINTON: Right.

STORM: That brings me to my next question. The head of FEMA, Mike Brown--I mean, there were reports this morning that he waited until hours after the hurricane hit to even request that a thousand FEMA workers go into the Gulf Coast region and even at that point gave them 48 hours to arrive. Should Mike Brown be fired?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I--you know, that's up to the president and up to the people in this administration. I would never have appointed such a person, I would imagine. I don't think that anybody would. You would appoint somebody who has experience. James Lee Witt, who was the director during the eight years of the Clinton administration, had years of experience responding to disasters, and he's now there--down there...

STORM: So you think he should be replaced?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, you know, that's up to them, Hannah. You know, they're going to have to make the decisions, and people will judge the decisions they make.

STORM: You met with these evacuees at the Astrodome, and I'm interested not only in your personal reflections, but whether or not you feel there is an adequate plan in place for these people who are right now in a state of limbo. They can't live in the Astrodome and in these shelters forever.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, they're working on a plan and, you know, I'm very anxious to see what that plan will be. A lot of the people I spoke with don't know what they're going to do. Obviously, they are being told they cannot return to their homes for months and months. They don't know where to go. They don't want to be, you know, moved too far away from what they're familiar with. They need jobs. They need to get their children in school. People are working very hard on this, and I was very impressed by, you know, the local response of the people, not only Houston but, from what I've heard, at many of the other places where, you know, many of these folks have been sent.

The real challenge is what are we doing to do to make sure that their lives are not just comfortable and safe for the next week or two or three, but that they are treated with the dignity and respect that any of us would want to see if we were in a similar position. You know, I think that, you know, the best rule in politics is the golden rule. I mean, we need to help these people as we would want to be helped if something disastrous happened to us. And that's going to take money. It's not only going to take the generosity of the American people who are, once again, giving in record amounts, but it's going to take our government. You know, a lot...

STORM: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, thank you.

We want to go now to Rene and Julie.

SYLER: All right. Hannah, thanks.

Up next, Harry will have more from a Louisiana town where oil and water has caused terrible damage.

JULIE CHEN (Co-host): And in our next half-hour, unbelievable pictures that show Katrina hammering the Mississippi Gulf Coast. This is THE EARLY SHOW on CBS.

"Tody," NBC, 9/7/2005

MATT LAUER, co-host:

The nation's capital may not have been hit by Katrina, but the impact is still being felt there. New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is calling for an independent investigation into what went wrong in the wake of the disaster.

Senator Clinton, good to see you. Good morning.

Senator HILLARY CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Thank you, Matt.

LAUER: You wrote a letter to the president, let me quote from it. Quote, "It has become increasingly evident our nation was not prepared to launch an effective federal response plan." You're calling for an independent commission to look into it. You've also said, quote, "I think FEMA is so dysfunctional right now, I don't know how they can go forward with this current leadership," end quote. So do you think this was a problem with an entire system, or did some key individuals make poor decisions in the fog of a--of a storm?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, Matt, I was listening to the early part of the program with Katie and, you know, I was in Houston on Monday, and everything she's seeing there, all of the people that she's meeting, really resonated with me because the thousands of people there asked me lots and lots of questions that I couldn't answer. They wanted to know why they didn't get help. They wanted to know why everything was so disorganized. And I think that not only do they deserve answers, but everyone along the Gulf Coast, and frankly, everybody in the country deserves answers, which is why I have called for an independent commission, one that is similar to what we did after 9/11, that has people who are not involved in the day-to-day work. We cannot afford to stop the day-to-day work. These, you know, tremendous challenges we face that you heard discussed in the segment that Katie just did, we have to be moving as rapidly and efficiently as possible. But it is clear to me that when the president signed the emergency declaration on August 27th, which was the Saturday before Katrina hit, the federal government said it would take the lead in coordinating a response to this catastrophe. And for whatever combination of reasons, it just didn't work. That has been a matter of, obviously, great concern and commentary over the last several days. I don't think the government can investigate itself. That's why I've called on an independent investigation.

LAUER: Well, let me ask you about something former FEMA Director James Lee Witt, who was FEMA director under your husband's administration, said before--before the disaster of Katrina. He said, quote, "I'm extremely concerned that the ability of our nation to prepare for and respond to disasters has been sharply eroded. I hear from emergency managers, local and state leaders, and first responders nearly every day that the FEMA they knew and worked well with has somehow disappeared."

Sen. CLINTON: Right.

LAUER: Now, you've called for legislation to remove FEMA from under the umbrella of homeland security. Why do you think under that umbrella that the capabilities of FEMA have been diminished?

Sen. CLINTON: I think there are several reasons, and obviously I agree with James Lee Witt. He was a superb director of FEMA during the Clinton administration. And what we tried to do during those eight years was to build up relationships between the federal government, state and local authorities, to have constant training, to look for ways to prevent and mitigate disasters. And what happened is several things. First of all, budgets were cut in the FEMA functions. Personnel were let go, a lot of people with a lot of experience. People were put in charge who didn't have the right kind of experience and expertise, and FEMA was put into the larger bureaucracy of the Department of Homeland Security.

You know, post 9/11, everybody thought we needed to focus on counterterrorism. What did we need to do to protect ourselves and prevent a terrorists attacks, having lived through the horrors of 9/11?

LAUER: Right.

Sen. CLINTON: But unfortunately there doesn't seem to be the level of competence within the bureaucracy so that FEMA could continue to perform its traditional function and, because of the budget decisions, the personnel decisions, the lack of organization, the poor leadership, you know, pick one, pick them all, they added up to what we saw in the last couple of weeks.

LAUER: By--by the way, a New York Times editorial today calls your--your decision to try to get FEMA out from under homeland security to be premature. Let me also ask you about something Ken Mehlman said, of course the chairman of the Republican National Committee, referring directly to you here. He said, quote, "You tell me who's taking what should be a moment of national unity and trying to score politically." How do you respond to that?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, you know, that's what they always do. I've been living with that kind of rhetoric for, I don't know, the last four and a half years. It's time to end it. It's time to actually show that this government can be competent. You know, the questions that have been raised about the competence and the effectiveness of this administration certainly are not limited to what's happened with Katrina. And every time anyone raises any kind of legitimate criticism and ask questions, they're attacked. And so, you know, let's...

LAUER: And...

Sen. CLINTON: ...co--let's stop. This is not a game. This is serious. The people that I met in Houston, you know, they want answers, and they want to know what went wrong...

LAUER: And just...

Sen. CLINTON: ...and they want to know what they are going to be able to count on in the future.

LAUER: Just 10 seconds left. It's estimated $150 billion to rebuild the Gulf Coast, where's that money come from?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, it comes from the first instance in not making those tax cuts for rich people like us permanent. You know, it means let's get back to shared sacrifice. Let's take care of each other, let's plan for the future, let's do what is necessary to put Americans first again.

LAUER: All right, Senator Hilly--Hillary Clinton. Senator, thanks so much for your time this morning.

Sen. CLINTON: Thanks, Matt.

LAUER: Nineteen after. Let's go over to the newsdesk now. Ann Curry's on assignment, and we've got Natalie Morales at the desk.

Natalie, good morning.

NATALIE MORALES, anchor:

And good morning to you, Matt. Good morning, everyone.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON DE-FENSE ACQUISITION/ORGANIZATION, 9/27/2005

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

General Kadish, the last sentence in your prepared testimony says when the panel has completed its work, you'd welcome the opportunity to return. When do you expect to complete the work of the panel?

KADISH: Senator Clinton, we're on track by the end of November to have a report and an initial set of recommendations at that time. Now, we may be a little bit later than that depending on how it plays out between now and then. But that's the target area that we're shooting for.

CLINTON: So could this committee expect to welcome you back sometime after the first of the year?

KADISH: I'd be happy to come back, Senator, about that time period.

CLINTON: General Kadish, does your charge for the defense acquisition performance review project include contract services?

KADISH: Secretary England's charge was very broad in chartering us. And we have looked at the operations and service contracting activities. But right now, our major focus is on weapons systems and hardware procurements and not services as the top priority.

CLINTON: So does that mean -- and this is not a comment about your work. I'm just trying to understand the scope of your responsibility. Does that mean then that when you've finished this report in November, it will not cover contract services?

KADISH: I'm not willing to say that now, Senator Clinton. We're looking at all these areas and how it affects everything the department does. And we'll have to -- just because of the sheer volume of it, we'll have to make cuts somewhere. But I'm fairly confident that a lot of these recommendations will affect service contracting in general and the way we procure services as well. So it may not be a specific area of concentration that are a chapter in the report, but it certainly will apply.

CLINTON: General, are you aware of a study that the British government did in the last several years looking at their acquisition process?

KADISH: We have done a literature search of all the acquisition systems, not only in the United States. I'm pretty sure it included the foreign systems as well. And I'm not sure I'm aware of that specific study. But if there's something of interest there, we can certainly look at it.

CLINTON: Secretary Krieg, you're nodding your head. Are you aware of that study?

KRIEG: Actually, I'm not aware of a specific study per say, but aware of the kind of changes. In fact, I had been over once. They've divided their requirements group from their procurement group. They have centralized their procurement function. They're struggling with many of the same kinds of issues. We actually used them as -- we use each other and try to share lessons learned because we have pursued some different paths. But we're in close communications with them, both through the acquisition side and the requirements side and work together on that.

CLINTON: I would be very interested in additional information about that because it's my understanding that they went totally outside. You know, they went to an international consulting firm. They didn't use retired people. They went to people who had expertise in supply change (ph) and just in time inventory and the like. They embedded consultants with their troops in Southern Iraq.

And out of that experience, I'm told, came some very useful recommendations. And they were able then to cut lots of the red tape and the bureaucracy. Now, that might or might not be directly applicable to large weapons systems, but it certainly did help to solve some of the problems they faced, which are problems we still face in getting adequate materials into, you know, combat theaters and all of the problems we've had now going on, you know, three, four years with, you know, up-armored Humvees, body armor, et cetera. So I would like very much to know more about what they determined.

So based on what you just said then, am I to assume or not that you've done some lessons learned coming out of Iraq and Afghanistan about some of the procurement acquisition challenges we faced in very real-time situations?

Secretary Krieg, have we done that?

Or Secretary England?

ENGLAND: Senator, if I could just address at least one of the specific cases, one I'm particularly familiar with. And that's how we count our IEDs, Improvised Explosive Devices, which are obviously a serious issue for our men and women and also for the Iraqi civilians. So we have in that particular case the group responsible -- they have budgetary authority directly to the general so the general can literally himself authorize $25 million of expenditures. And he reports directly to me also with the vice-chairman. So he has a direct pipeline to both of us.

They have people literally embedded in the field with the operating people. We have operating people here. We have dedicated test sites set up that we have put together here in the United States to test the equipment. So we've put together as a result of lessons learned in Iraq.

We have tried to apply a lot of those lessons learned in literally how we develop what the requirements are, how we field, how we train, I mean, comprehensively trying to deal with those kind of problems. So I can tell you that there are examples where I think we have learned a lot and applied a lot of those lessons learned in terms of what we do every day to be as quick and responsive as we can to our men and women in Iraq and Afghanistan.

CLINTON: I think the IED story is a good story because clearly, there has been a concerted effort to try to deal and defeat this particular form of attack. But I, for one, have never quite gotten straight all of the problems we had on a lesser level with adequate vehicles, with adequate armor. And we've read lots of news accounts. But have there also been, you know, lessons learned that you're applying in this ongoing process that General Kadish is running as to, you know, what we have learned that will inform the decisions that this panel is making about recommendations?

General Kadish or...

KRIEG (?): Go ahead, Ron.

KADISH: Senator Clinton, we did an extensive set of sessions on the agile combat support type of activities that each of the services are putting in place, have put in place. And those lessons learned will trickle -- trickle is the wrong word -- will be a part of the overall process that we're going to recommend.

There are some significantly -- there are some wonderful things that have happened in these processes. Some of the other issues were very interesting. I just might point out that people in the process that were trying to do these very difficult and fast-paced type of activities didn't think they had the authorities to do them in the bureaucracy.

And what one of the major lessons learned, at least for me, was that we've got to fix that somehow because they did have the authority. And that's a training issue. It's a workforce issue. So I think you'll see that that will be a major part of our emphasis.

CLINTON: Well, I appreciate that because, you know, we're now getting reports that, you know, for the Guard that was assigned to the Gulf coast, their equipment was inadequate, their communications systems were scarce. And, you know, it all is part of the same set of issues that we're trying to confront. So thank you.

GIAMBASTIANI: If I may, just to add, Senator Clinton, there's a very extensive lessons learned effort going on for this hurricane relief, both in Katrina and in Rita. Joint Forces Command has upwards of 25, 30 people forward deployed in addition to the reach back. We've got a governmental lessons learned effort we're participating in right now. Northern Command has embedded personnel. We've sent teams forward. They were there before, during and after Rita, for example. So we're trying to collect a significant amount to report on those types of issues. Thank you.

U.S SENATOR JAMES INHOFE HOLDS A HEARING ON SCIENCE IN ENVIRONMENTAL POLICY-MAKING, 9/28/2005

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I want to certainly support Senator Jeffords' efforts to come up with legislation. I look forward to the hearings that you'll be holding next week.

I have to say, Mr. Chairman, I think that the topic of this hearing is a very important one. Unfortunately, I think the hearing is organized in a way that will muddy the issues around sound science rather than helping us clarify them.

First, with all respect to the extraordinary entertainment value and success of Dr. Crichton's works, his views on climate change are at odds with the vast majority of climate scientists.

More importantly, his critique of climate change science appears in a work of fiction. It's a work of fiction even if it has footnotes, Mr. Chairman. His views have not been peer reviewed. They do not appear in any scientific journal.

I won't go into an assessment of Mr. Crichton's critique point by point, because we don't have time. However, I do want to submit for the record a document prepared by the Union of Concerned Scientists that rebuts Mr. Crichton's primary arguments.

In addition, I want to submit a document prepared by James Hansen, director of the Columbia University Earth Institute and Goddard Institute for Space Studies. In this document, Mr. Hansen details the distortions of his climate change predictions made by Mr. Crichton in his best-selling novel.

Rather than focusing on Mr. Crichton's testimony, however, I would like to focus on several broader points about environmental policy-making and the record of this administration, because I think this administration has taken the politicization of science to new levels.

And that's not just my opinion, it's the opinion of hundreds of prominent scientists -- 49 Nobel Laureates, 63 National Medal of Science recipients, 154 members of the National Academies and thousands of other scientists who have signed a statement criticizing the administration's misuse and politicization of science.

I want to read just a brief excerpt from that statement: "When scientific knowledge has been found to be in conflict with its political goal, the administration has often manipulated the process through which science enters into its decision.

"This has been done by placing people who are professionally unqualified or who have clear conflicts of interest in official posts and on scientific advisory committees, by disbanding existing advisory committees, by censoring and suppressing reports by the government's own scientists and by simply not seeking independent scientific advice.

"Other administrations have, on occasion, engaged in such practices, but not so systematically nor on so wide a front.

"Furthermore, in advocating policies that are not scientifically sound, the administration has sometimes misrepresented scientific knowledge and mislead the public about the implication of its policies.

"For example, in support of the president's decision to avoid regulating emissions that cause climate change, the administration has consistently misrepresented the findings of the National Academy of Sciences, government scientists and the expert community at large.

"Thus in June 2003, the White House demanded extensive changes in the treatment of climate change in a major report by the Environment Protection Agency. To avoid issuing a scientifically indefensible report, EPA officials eviscerated the discussion of climate change and its consequences," end quote.

And, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the full statement be included in the record.

INHOFE: Without objection.

CLINTON: Now, unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the administration has not only misused scientific data, they've also underfunded basic science.

Funding for scientific research has flat-lined over the past few years, and this year the administration's proposed budget actually calls for a decrease in real dollars for federally funded research.

Most of the R&D budget increases that did occur in the president's budget were for new defense weapons systems, not for basic research in electronics, nanotechnology, computing, energy, physics, and all of the other sciences.

I believe the U.S. is in real danger of losing its lead in science and advanced technology. Federal R&D plays a critical role in the education and training of future scientists and engineers, technological innovations, advancing health, increasing economic growth and competitiveness.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I'm not, unfortunately, going to be able to stay for the entire panel, but I want to just make a few additional brief comments.

INHOFE: Senator Clinton, I'm very, very sorry. We're all adhering to the time limit.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, if I could just get one minute. I just want to make a comment about a few of the witnesses.

INHOFE: Doctor, would you like to yield her one of your minutes?

CLINTON: I wouldn't ask that.

But I think that actually I may say something you would agree with, Mr. Chairman.

(UNKNOWN): I ask unanimous consent that the senator from New York have an additional 60 seconds.

INHOFE: With objection, so ordered.

CLINTON: Thank you.

I want to thank the panelists, although I think that the point of the hearing is misleading. I think that some of the testimony from the panelists is very important.

I want to thank Dr. Roberts for making it clear that there are questions that need to be raised about DDT. I think that is an essential issue that we need to look at. We can't necessarily turn the clock back, but I think the threat of malaria is real.

I also want to thank Mr. Sandalow. And I agree with you about the National Academy of Sciences' request -- that you put in your testimony.

And, finally, I want to thank Ambassador Benedick. Your testimony about what can happen if people act in good faith is absolutely inspiring. The Montreal Protocol did risk imposing substantial short-run economic dislocations, even though the evidence was incomplete.

But as your testimony demonstrates and as you conclude in your testimony, politics is the art of taking good decisions on insufficient evidence based on the best possible science.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON PENDING DEFENSE NOMINATIONS,

COMMITTEE: SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to welcome both of you and also your wives. I know that this is a joint service responsibility, and I appreciate their service as well as yours.

General Smith, I appreciated the opportunity to talk with you in my office last week. As you know, I had a special interest in Joint Forces Command. I have visited Norfolk twice as part of my participation in the Joint Forces Command Transformation Advisory Group. And I think that the command that you are about to assume has a particularly critical role to play in developing processes and technologies that support joint operations.

And I appreciated the candor that you displayed in answering Senator Dayton's response, because I think the 50-yard line is probably about right.

I'm not sure we can take another 10 or 15 years to get to the goal line. And I believe that we need to hear from you, after you've gotten your feet on the ground, what more we can do to assist Joint Forces in moving some of these critically needed technologies and components like interoperability forward.

I also think our acquisition and procurement system could benefit from a joint approach, and hope that you will consider that issue once you are confirmed. But I do look forward to working with you in the future.

And, General Bell, I think that you have a particularly difficult assignment right now. We all know the reasons. Senator Levin spoke in some detail about the nuclear challenges we face from the North, but we also face a fraying of our relations with the people of South Korea and their understanding of the importance of our position there and what we have done over so many decades to really provide them the freedom that they have enjoyed to develop the economy that is now providing so many benefits for the South Koreans.

So in effect, you will have a diplomatic role as well as a military one. And I know you understand how important that is. And I appreciate your taking it on.

I want to just follow up on some of Senator Levin's concerns. In February, North Korea declared that its self-imposed moratorium on long-range missile testing was over.

On April 28th, at a hearing of this committee, I asked Vice Admiral Jacobi, the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, whether North Korea has the ability to arm a missile with a nuclear device.

His answer was, and I quote, "My assessment is that they have the capability to do that. Yes, ma'am."

In your estimation, what is the best way to deter North Korea from conducting long-range missile tests?

BELL: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

I think the first and most important way is to ensure that the North Koreans understand that our alliances are not just intact, they are strong, and that the community of free nations, led by the United States, is willing to defend our democracies and that for them to pursue weapons of mass destruction, nuclear weapons and missile technology on which potentially these kinds of weapons could be mounted, is not in their best interest and it's certainly not in the best interests of a peaceful world.

So I think, first, we have to be strong in our own readiness, in our own capabilities. Second, I think we are properly positioned to enter into a dialogue with the North Koreans through the six-party talks.

These talks have been fruitful in recent times. They represent all the countries that are most engaged in this area of the world with respect to the assurances of a peaceful and stable Korean peninsula.

I think our ambassador to these talks, Ambassador Hill, has achieved great success here recently. Everything must be verifiable. And we have to proceed forward.

But I would say, in the context of the six-party talks, that the assurances that we both denuclearize or that we see a denuclearized North Korea as well as a standing down of the technologies, missile and otherwise, to deliver these weapons is important; and that we should support this process and ensure that it goes forward successfully.

CLINTON: Related to that, General, given North Korea's record of proliferation of missiles and illicit trade activity, what is the best way to deter North Korea from selling nuclear material or technology to rogue states or terrorist groups?

BELL: Well, the best way to deter them, Senator Clinton, would be to make sure that they don't have the stuff to sell or to market. And so I would hope again that the six-party talks would lead to a regimen where these kinds of weapons would be removed from the North Korean inventory.

BELL: That's first. Second, we need to ensure that our alliances, friends and partners around the world assist us in ensuring that not only do they not participate in proliferation, but that they also inform those who they have close contacts with not to do the same.

I think that the United States and all of our allies around the world, friends and partners, should draw a very sharp line on this issue and ensure that we, first, state clearly that we do not want them to participate in anything that could proliferate these weapons.

And then, second, if they do, we would like to discuss that with them as to what it means to our relationships. From a military perspective -- and I admit to you, in a second, that I have certain diplomatic roles -- but from a military perspective, my view would be to make sure that our alliance with the Republic of Korea and the coalition members remain strong.

And so that that piece of deterrence and defense, if necessary is never at doubt. And I can assure you, Senator, that if I'm confirmed to this position, that'll be my focus.

CLINTON: I really appreciate that very much, General, because I think we're at a critical juncture, obviously, in our relations with the North, which is obvious from the six-party talks and the threats they pose, but I think also with the South. And I think that there is a lack of understanding and a sense of almost historical amnesia that we have to combat and make sure people understand what the stakes are.

Thank you very much.

SENATE DEMOCRATS HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON AVIAN FLU, 11/1/2005

CLINTON: Well, the good news is that the administration has acted and recognized that an ounce of prevention is truly worth a pound of cure. The bad news is that they've acted late, they've acted too little, and they have not recognized that simply having vaccine available doesn't mean it will get where it's needed.

One has to wonder how this administration, which has presided over several shortages of seasonal flu vaccines over the past several years, could with a straight face claim that we were ready merely by stockpiling or doing additional research into a vaccine.

The sad fact is that our nation is not prepared to handle a major flu outbreak, let alone a pandemic. Since 2000, we have experienced these three shortages of seasonal flu vaccine, and the question the administration needs to answer is: How will it handle distribution demands with a system that has failed repeatedly?

Now, while the president's plan calls for us to develop credible distribution mechanisms and prioritize countermeasure allocations for at-risk populations, we already do that for seasonal flu vaccine and we're still not able to get it to all the seniors who need it.

Therefore, in addition to what the president has proposed -- which is really, from my perspective, playing the repetition game because the leaders on this are before you -- Senator Harkin, Senator Obama and Senator Kennedy have been not only sounding the alarm, but presenting thoughtful legislation asking for appropriations for a year.

CLINTON: And now, finally, the president comes late to the party and says he's going to do it.

However, if we're going to have the kind of distribution that we need, we have to establish a tracking system. And that's part of what I've called for in legislation I've introduced called the Influenza Vaccine Security Act.

That would allow the federal government, working with state and local health departments, to track vaccine from factories to clinics so all Americans will know where local vaccines supplies are, particularly if and when a pandemic hits.

Now, the problems we face with a potential pandemic are made even worse because of the way this administration has begun to defund public health.

And this is another area that Senator Harkin has spoken out about eloquently, that Senator Kennedy has been a leader on, you know, for decades.

And what we see is they are creating a system that has no foundation. Because the only way we're going to be able to deliver this, assuming we can produce it, that we can use cell technology to produce it faster than the traditional egg technology takes and that we can, you know, be able to track it and get it where it needs to be as if we have a hand-in-glove relationship with state and local government.

The best example of how poorly prepared this administration is, unfortunately, we saw in the wake of Katrina, where they not only let down state and local government but didn't really understand what was required.

The fact is the administration has not supported necessary funding to repair our broken public health infrastructure and to enable our state and local health departments to work.

When we talked to our health departments across New York, they can tell you chapter and verse how they are being defunded. There used to be a partnership. You know, back around 1947, '48, we had the threat of a smallpox epidemic because someone was found to have smallpox in New York City.

The New York City Public Health Department, with support from the federal government, vaccinated more than 6 million people within three days. That was when we had a Public Health Department and we didn't even have TVs widely available or Internets.

CLINTON: But there was a system in place, and the system worked.

That has been built up over decades. This administration is tearing it down with their misplaced financial priorities.

So I think we all want to thank the president for what he said today. But let's put money where his mouth is. Let's put infrastructure development where it is needed.

And that's going to require that we have a system that works and that it work with the financing that is required.

I have to say, it's a little bit discouraging when we know that on the floor of the Senate right now, we have a budget resolution that will drive our country even deeper into debt, will defund important domestic priorities at a time when we can ill afford it, and provide even more tax cuts for people who I guess think they can go around in a bubble and be unaffected by any kind of pandemic that might come from birds far across the sea.

Well, the fact is, we are all in this together. And together we can do better. America can do better. But we can't do better unless we have a commitment that everybody works together and that we understand being able to lead internationally in facing down a pandemic requires that we begin right here at home in getting our own house in order.

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY) DELIVERS REMARKS AT FUNERAL OF ROSA PARKS, 11/2/2005

LOCATION: DETROIT, MICHIGAN

(JOINED IN PROGRESS)

CLINTON: ... join with those who knew and loved Rosa Parks and the countless others who may never have met her but who were inspired by her example.

The country has shown great respect for Rosa Parks in the last days since her death.

(APPLAUSE)

I am grateful for that show of respect, but I will be more grateful if our nation shows by our actions that we understood her sacrifice and commitment to knitting up the wounds and healing the country that she serves.

(APPLAUSE)

We all remember that moment on the bus. But let us think that that was not just an isolated moment to be honored and put on a shelf in the history books. We will dishonor her memory if we do not in our own ways have moments like that in our lives which add up to the continuing transformation of America on its journey to fulfill the promise that we made so long ago: one nation, under God, where all men and women are created equal, and where no person is left behind, overlooked and disrespected any longer.

(APPLAUSE)

As we listened to some great preaching -- and there's more to come -- can't you just see these preachers, some of whom are the best America has ever produced...

(APPLAUSE)

... every one of them could captivate and keep us here until dawn.

(LAUGHTER)

But, you know, when a preacher preaches, it's not just to show you how eloquent he or she is, it is to change our hearts and set us on a new path toward a new life, with new hope.

(APPLAUSE)

We all need to remember that we can have our Rosa Parks moments. Every time we stand up for someone who is being mistreated, every time we turn away from prejudice and bigotry, every time we support those who are on the front lines fighting for our rights, we are part of Rosa Parks and her legacy.

So let us not just honor her with words. Let us pass on her story and her example to all children. Let us remember how hard she worked to vote, and vote in every election that we have a chance to do so.

(APPLAUSE)

And while we're at it, let's make sure every vote counts and every vote is counted.

(APPLAUSE)

And let's not grow weary of doing the Lord's work, which is our work on this Earth. Not all of us will have a moment of courage and conviction that the world will see, but we will know. We will know whether we lived up to the example that this brave woman's life set for us.

And when we do, those quiet Rosa Parks moments will ripple out from each of us and change the world.

This is a moment of reflection and remembrance, but it must also be a time of challenge and call to action.

(APPLAUSE)

Every single one of us can live up to what we know is best in us and best in our nation because 50 years ago we know she did.

So let us think about not just this day, but all the days to follow. And as we do, let us remind each other we, too, can have a Rosa Parks moment.

Thank you and God bless you.

(APPLAUSE)

DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF CONGRESS HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON FINANCIAL AID FOR 9/11 RESPONDERS, 11/10/2005

CLINTON: Good afternoon.

I want to thank all of our colleagues from the New York delegation for being here. Commissioner Scoppetta is on his way, should be here momentarily, Chief Hayden as well.

But we have a broad cross-section of people who have been fighting for this money -- Pete Gorman of the Uniformed Firefighters Association, Pam Delaney from the New York City Police Foundation, Tom Hart from the Operating Engineers, Suzie Ballantine (ph) from the AFL-CIO, and others who have traveled down to Washington.

We're here today to make sure that the $125 million slated for New York following the attacks of September 11th remains available for the outstanding and continuing needs that many, many people are facing.

Following the attacks, which claimed over 3,000 lives, as we all know, and caused severe medical and mental health illnesses, the president of the United States told the governor, told the mayor, told this country that we would do whatever it takes to help the people of New York rebuild and recover.

The New York delegation said it would take $20 billion. The president agreed.

The president and the Congress appropriated $20 billion. But now bureaucrats in the Office of Management and Budget are trying to take back $125 million of that money in the president's budget.

They want to go back on the word of the president. They want to undercut the will of this Congress by using budget gimmicks and sleight of hand.

It's not right. And we must not let it happen.

I offered an amendment in the Senate last week that was cosponsored by Senator Schumer. And we worked hard to get it accepted. It restored $125 million that is rightfully ours in one of the appropriations bills. And that money is meant to be used for the needs that all of us see every single day in our state.

The money would go for purposes that are well-known. First, $50 million would be provided to the New York State Uninsured Employers Fund for reimbursement of claims related to the attacks and for other claims needed for emergency services personnel who were injured, disabled or died due to the attacks.

CLINTON: Second, $75 million would be provided for organizations that administer the baseline and follow-up screening, clinical examinations and long-term medical health monitoring analysis and treatment for emergency services personnel and recovery and rescue personnel.

I was very grateful that, in the Senate, Chairman Specter and Senator Harkin worked with us and were very helpful in getting this money restored.

Now, the money was originally designated as emergency spending. And we should not have to find offsets in the budget to pay for this money. You know, some people say: Well, if New York wants $125 million, then cut $125 million from somewhere else.

Well, that is a non-starter. This was emergency money with a very specific purpose, promised to us by the president and the Congress.

So we are not asking for new money. We are not asking for money above the $20 billion that was promised and appropriated for New York.

We are simply asking that this Congress and the administration not take away money that was already appropriated and is so important to meet the needs of people in our state.

We know people continue to suffer. I see them all the time. I meet people on Long Island, in the city, Westchester -- and they'll come up to me and (OFF-MIKE) they'll sound like that. They'll say, (OFF-MIKE) "Hello, Senator."

And Bill and I were together just the other day on Long Island and we know that that's what happens. People can't breathe; they have stress-related problems; they need the continuing medical and mental health tracking, screening and treatment.

So we must not abandon our fellow citizens. They deserve this help; they've earned this help; and the money is for them.

So you have a bipartisan commitment on behalf of the New York delegation to talk with everyone in leadership in both houses, on both sides of the aisle to try to get this done.

And we're calling on the Speaker of the House, the Senate majority leader, the Appropriations Committee leaders in both the House and the Senate, to make sure this money is available for New Yorkers.

Now, I have a lot of people here who want to and need to say something. And we're going to start with Senator Schumer, who has to leave.

Then we'll go to Congresswoman Maloney, Congressman Rangel, Congressman Fossella, Congresswoman Lowey. And then we'll get into our other guests.

Chuck?

SCHUMER: Well, thank you, Hillary. And let me just say that this is basically somebody taking money from New York. This is not new money that we are asking for. This is money we were promised.

We all know that, on the day after 9/11, I told the president we needed $20 billion. He said yes. And, by and large, the president has stuck with that.

He has let us transfer money from one account to another. He has been supportive of, for instance, we are now, in the Finance Committee, trying to get some of the old tax money, put for $2 billion into rail transportation.

They've been good on all those things. So you can imagine all of our surprise, chagrin, disappointment when, in the budget document, buried away, was this provision rescinding $125 million which had already been given us.

SCHUMER: This is not new money. This is not someone being nice to New York. In fact, it's the opposite. It's people taking money away.

And what are they taking the money away from? The people who suffered. The people who suffered on 9/11. The people who came down afterwards, no questions asked, and said, "We're going to help."

This was unanimous in the Congress -- in the House, in the Senate -- that those people should get some help. And to, in the dark of night, snatch it away and now make us do this to get it back is absolutely disgraceful.

Now, we've had luck, as Hillary mentioned, getting Senators Specter and Harkin to help us here. I've spent a long time with Senator Specter on this. I think he understands the need and the appropriateness that we have this money.

And so it is now in the appropriations bill for HHS and Labor and Human Services.

We cannot see in the conference and other procedure that unfortunately has become dark-of-night.

This money -- again, taken out of the Senate bill -- we need to the House to go along with us. And that's why I'm so glad we have a bipartisan delegation from the House here to help us.

(CROSSTALK)

SCHUMER: The whole city delegation.

So that is important. That's why we have such distinguished labor leaders here, because the people they represent, as Hillary outlined, are suffering. And that is why we feel so strongly about this.

This is our money. This is money that was allocated by previous congresses and the White House for a very noble, important purpose. We will not let them take it away from us.

MALONEY: Thank you. Thank you.

I am very proud to stand here with the New York delegation, united like we were after 9/11.

MALONEY: We are united because we know the take-back of $125 million from sick and injured 9/11 workers is absolutely wrong, and we are not going to let it happen without a fight.

We are united on this. Last night we met as a bipartisan delegation on it for well over a half hour. I just left Sue Kelly in a committee meeting she's chairing. She said go get it back. Jim Walsh called my office today. He's continuing to set up meetings with the leadership. Chairman Regula has talked to the senators and is working very hard.

Everyone says we deserve it, we should be it, the workers need it, and we are dedicated to making it happen. And that is why this group has come down here today.

We know that it is needed for health care, worker's compensation and medical monitoring. And with the hard work of everyone here today, including the absolutely great work of our two senators who got the money restored in the Senate with a unanimous vote, we are inching closer and closer to the finish line.

We are close, but there is much more work that needs to be done, and that is why we are here with a day-long lobbying effort with leaders from the New York City Fire Department, police department, the federal law enforcement officers, the state AFL-CIO, and of course 9/11 responders and doctors from the important monitoring program.

They will make the case for restoring this money, and I confident that as soon as the members and leaders hear their stories about the unmet health needs, we will win, we will save this money for the workers of 9/11.

Members will hear that thousands of people who responded to ground zero are still sick. Many of them have what is called the World Trade Center cough and are suffering from asthma. They will hear that there is no federal money for treatment, that the medical monitoring program that we worked hard to set up will expire in two years, that there is no medical monitoring program for up to 10,000 federal workers who were exposed to toxins at ground zero.

Members will learn that if this money is taken back, it means the absolute immediate end of assistance being paid to volunteers who came from across this country to help, but are now sick and need our help.

When the administration first proposed taking this money away, they argued that they could do it because it was not needed. Absolutely nothing could be further from the truth.

MALONEY: And all you have to do is speak to these officials and these responders to know that this money is needed.

Those workers who risked their lives on 9/11 did not think about the health risk they were exposing themselves to, and now we need to make sure that that money is there. We need to rescue that money so that their health care needs can be taken care of.

So together we are very close to the finish line. We are going to work like the dickens to make sure that this money is restored. It is needed for the workers, volunteers and for the health care of the people who responded on 9/11.

Thank you.

Charlie?

RANGEL: Thank you.

Last night, the entire New York delegation met -- led by Carolyn and Sherwood Boehlert -- to make certain that we let our colleagues in the Congress know that this isn't a New York City/New York state problem; it's a national problem.

And how we react to the tragedy that occurred in New York -- God forbid if it ever happens any place else -- this is an example that's being set.

The whole world, the whole nation remembered what happened to us on September 11th, 2001. We're here to make certain that they don't forget how they treat us -- our other people, our courageous firemen, our policemen, our volunteers, those would believe that God was on their side and the nation was on their side. (inaudible) came across not just for us but for our country, and our president responded.

We're only asking them: Don't forget us in November '05 for what was promised in September '01.

The House of Representatives has been led by Carolyn Maloney and Vito Fossella. There has not been a fight that we have not come together, not as partisans, not as members of New York, but as Americans, in trying to make certain that all America feels assured that their country, their government, their president and their Congress is going to be for them.

And so it's a pleasure that we have Vito Fossella here, that we never have to ask for anything because he's right there with Carolyn making certain that our needs are heard.

So I am glad to present him to you.

Vito Fossella?

FOSSELLA: Thank you Charlie. And thank you to the dean of the delegation.

Let me also thank and commend Senators Clinton and Schumer for fighting so hard in the Senate, and other members, especially Carolyn, but other members of the New York delegation.

And I welcome Commissioner Scoppetta and Chief Hayden and, of course, all the other labor leaders.

FOSSELLA: I think one thing is very, very clear -- and you heard it from the speaker -- is that Americans really don't like people who break their promises. And I don't think, in this instance, that Congress should break its promise to the heroes of 9/11.

The story of 9/11 is still being told. While we continue to look for the rebuilding of the buildings in Ground Zero, we must never forget or lose sight of the fact that there are thousands of lives that are still being rebuilt.

There are those who are still suffering and, sadly, there are those who will suffer not just today or next year, but perhaps decades from now.

As if anybody needs further proof or further study, it is common wisdom that, in too many instances, respiratory problems or mental problems incubate and do not manifest themselves for years.

So when Congress and everybody across this country stood up in the aftermath of September 11th, they said rightly, "We will not turn our backs on the people of New York."

And it's not just the heroes of 9/11 from New York, it's New Jersey and Connecticut and the thousands of volunteers across the country.

So the moral of the story here is America and Congress cannot and should not break its promise. We stand united. It's not Democrats and Republicans today. It's all Americans, the entire New York delegation, to say that promise must be kept.

Thank you.

LOWEY: I, too, want to thank Senator Clinton for taking the lead on this issue in the Senate. And it's been a pleasure for us to work with Carolyn Maloney in the House and my other colleagues.

This is a bipartisan issue. It is not a political issue. And it is a national issue. And I particularly want to thank Commissioners Scoppetta and all the representatives of the workers, the EMS workers, the first responders, the police, the firefighters.

They didn't hesitate when they were called and when they volunteered to go down to the site on 9/11 and weeks after that. They are still suffering from all the symptoms that remain, and we have a moral responsibility -- a national moral responsibility -- to deliver the dollars that are necessary to help them get well.

Promises made, promises kept. In this Congress, we shouldn't be delivering with one hand and taking back with the other hand.

LOWEY: We have a responsibility to make sure that these dollars are treated as emergency dollars.

Serving with Jim Walsh on the committee, as the New Yorkers, working with Ralph Regula, the chairman, and David Obey, the ranking member, my message out there is: Mr. President, you have to call the Congress; you made the promise; you must deliver and you must ensure that these promises that were made by the president of the United States and the leadership on the Senate and the House are kept.

Promises that were made must be kept.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Jerry?

NADLER: Thank you very much, Hillary.

After 9/11, the president of the United States was photographed with an iconic photo, with firefighters, a couple of days after 9/11.

And we all started talking about the heroes of 9/11, the firefighters, the police officers, the sanitation workers, the volunteers from all over who came in to help.

And yet, this country has betrayed, repeatedly betrayed, all the heroes of 9/11 and the aftermath.

We've betrayed them first: City, state and federal government betrayed them by permitting them to work on the pile for 40 and 50 days without proper respiratory protection, without proper environmental protection.

The result is that over half, more than half of all the people who worked there by now have so far come down with serious respiratory ailments, with serious respiratory diseases.

Second betrayal: We have not provided any funding for their medical treatment. Many of these people have lost their jobs. Because of their injury, they cannot continue to work. And they've lost their medical benefits. And we have not provided anything for that.

Third betrayal: The worker's comp applications are being controverted. They're contested by the insurance carriers at a rate of five to 10 times the normal rate of controversy and our various regulatory agencies have let that occur.

And now the fourth betrayal is, we have funds for medical monitoring but only for another two years and then it expires.

And now some people want to do a fifth betrayal, that we should betray the workers, betray the heroes of 9/11 by taking these funds for worker's comp and for assisting the workers away from New York so that they will have even less assistance.

That's wrong. I want to commend Senators Clinton and Schumer for the wonderful work they've done in the Senate on trying to reverse this and Carolyn and Vito and Nita and Charlie and others in the delegation, who've worked tirelessly to change this at this level.

Congressman Regula, the chairman of the committee, has been very good in trying to get this money back, but, as Nita put it at the delegation meeting last night, it's probably above his pay-grade and the real person at issue here now is the Speaker of the House, Denny Hastert.

And we hope that the pressure will be on him to do the right thing, to instruct the conferees from the House to go along with the Senate and to remove -- or restore, I should say -- restore the emergency designation.

We've betrayed these people enough. We should restore these funds, not demand an offset for them.

And then we should get onto the business of making sure that the monitoring funds are there in perpetuity and that health care funds are provided.

Thank you very much.

CLINTON: Thank you. Thanks to all of our colleagues in the House who are working so hard on this.

We've been joined by Commissioner Scoppetta and Chief of Department Hayden. I'd like each of them to address this.

They are here today to go to the leadership of the Congress to speak with them, to make the case as they see it. And we're very, very grateful that they would take time out of such stressful and busy schedules to be here and make this case.

CLINTON: Commissioner?

SCOPPETTA: Well thank you, Senator Clinton -- and our thanks to Senator Schumer -- for the work they did in the Senate and the entire New York delegation, with Carolyn Maloney in the House.

It's really very straightforward. By now the whole world knows that, in the space of less than two hours, 343 firefighters were killed, and 27 police officers, when those towers came down.

What a lot of people may not know is that thousands -- literally, thousands -- of firefighters, EMS and police are affected with a variety of illnesses as a result of the work they did for months at the World Trade Center site; first trying to rescue people caught in the debris and then trying to recover remains.

And that went on for about six months.

And we have had 13,000 firefighters who have, in one form or another, had to receive some medical treatment. Happily, many of them were able to continue with the work and go back to full duty.

But literally thousands have left the department, and many of them are without the assistance they need and we're without the information we need to be able to track them.

And so a part of this funding is so that we can be able to provide the kind of medical treatment that they need down the road.

Just one final point: Many of these ailments are the kinds of illnesses -- respiratory, stress, the kind of psychological counseling they needed -- that simply didn't make itself felt in the immediate aftermath of 9/11.

And all of these ailments now are making themselves felt. And it's the same experience that Oklahoma City found that, years after the event, they needed the kind of counseling and treatment that would restore them to a full and useful life.

SCOPPETTA: So this money was in the budget and it wasn't spent in 2002 for a variety of reasons that are explainable and extremely plausible. What we're asking is that it be restored to the budget as emergency funds, just the way they were initially.

I'd like you to hear from Chief Hayden, our chief of the department, who was in the north tower on 9/11; was the incident commander for months thereafter; and he can tell you about how badly we need these funds.

Pete?

HAYDEN: Thank you.

Well, I guess I offer a unique perspective. I was working on 9/11. I was in command of the operations in the north tower on 9/11. I was in the lobby of the north tower when the south tower collapsed.

And I was out on West Street when the north tower collapsed and the Marriott Hotel collapsed and, later on that day, when the second World Trade Center collapsed.

I can tell you first-hand the conditions that existed that day and the terrible dust conditions. And for many months afterward, I worked down there, directing the recovery operations.

For months afterward, we had fires burning in the pile and surrounding buildings in the immediate aftermath. The fires, the smoke conditions that existed, the environmental conditions that existed took a tremendous effect on our firefighters.

We've had a five-fold increase in the amount of people with respiratory problems in the department. We've had about 450 firefighters forced to retire since 9/11 with respiratory problems.

These are problems that do not solve themselves. They are continuing problems. I know firsthand, well, a number of men who have been forced to retire, whose conditions are declining and getting worse.

We've had three-fold increase in the number of firefighters after 9/11 seeking counseling. That was a difficult operation on that day. The FDNY suffered a terrible wound. That wound is still open. It's not healed. It's going to take a long time.

The firefighters, the police officers, the EMTs, the federal law enforcement authorities that worked down there on 9/11 and for the many months afterward did the right thing. We expect that the right thing will be done for them today.

CLINTON: Thank you so much. Beautiful.

“On the Record with Greta Van Susteren,” FOX, 12/19/2005

KENDALL: Tonight, it has been nearly four months since Hurricane Katrina slammed the Gulf Coast. Huge improvements have been made since the devastating hurricane but there is still much more to be done.

Over the weekend, Greta caught up with Senator Hillary Clinton in New Orleans.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

GRETA VAN SUSTEREN, HOST: Where do we come up with these numbers like $3 billion and $2 billion? I mean I hear these horrendous numbers and maybe they're needed but who's figuring these out, I mean any idea?

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, you know, when the emergency money was appropriated after the hurricanes it was a very broad best guess about what was needed and similarly after 9/11, you know. We appropriated $40 billion, approximately 20 for the war and for other needs that our military and homeland security had, 20 for New York and Virginia, The Pentagon, et cetera, to be rebuilt. Well, we appropriated that money based on our best information at the time. Then we reallocated within it.

VAN SUSTEREN: So it's a little bit of a guess. I mean I hate to use that word guess but guesswork as we go is that how we do this money thing?

CLINTON: No, it is an assessment of what we think we'll need but you appropriate a large amount of money. A lot of the money, for example, in the Katrina emergency went to FEMA.

Well, frankly FEMA has not been the best steward of the money and not been very swift in getting the money out and has, you know, a federal judge here in New Orleans just a couple weeks ago said that their, you know, actions have been erratic and eccentric and bizarre and everything else.

They just haven't really fulfilled the public trust they were given. So, what Mary Landrieu and others have been arguing is take some of that money that is in the pot already, it's already been appropriated and shift it over to what are called community development block grants, so that you can get the garbage picked up. You can get the police and fire departments back up.

We were just at that church, the Queen Mary of Vietnam Catholic Church. They want to put trailers across the street so that their parishioners can actually live there and the church can be the center of rebuilding. I think that's a great idea.

Well, they don't have police protection yet, so getting the money into the right pocket and then holding everybody accountable and having good accounting so that we really watch every dollar as it's spent is what we should be doing.

VAN SUSTEREN: I think most Americans are a little suspicious though. I mean we're a very generous country but, you know, when we dish out money we don't know where it goes. I mean we're not sure we're getting a bang for our buck.

CLINTON: Well, I understand that, you know. Look, I was raised by a father who didn't believe in credit cards and the whole nine yards. I consider myself in that category and I think that's why you need to have good systems in place to start with.

I mean look I was heartbroken when I saw how dysfunctional FEMA had become. It worked during the Clinton administration. James Lee Witt and the team that he brought in they were on top of it. They responded. They knew how to...

VAN SUSTEREN: They didn't have Katrina though and 9/11.

CLINTON: No, but they had earthquakes. They had the, you know, huge flood in the Middle West. They had lots of natural disasters. But these are unprecedented so even more you need to be fully prepared and up to speed and have the best people, not the cronies but the experts in charge.

This administration I think has learned that lesson a little bit late and we paid a big price for it, so I don't blame any American sitting, you know, in New York, California, anywhere else saying hey I want to make sure the money goes to the right place.

That too is a federal government responsibility. There should be an inspector general. There should be really strict accounting. I've called for the same thing with Iraq. Look at the money we've wasted in Iraq. I mean look at the money that we've given in no bid contracts that we can't even find where it went. They've wasted billions of dollars. It is wrong.

And, for me, it is just an example of a failure to, you know, run a government competently, whether it's, you know, spending money in Iraq or failing to spend it here in New Orleans and along the Gulf Coast.

We can do better. America can do better. We've done better in the past and I think we should get back to doing better and we should expect everybody in public office to live up to that standard.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

KENDALL: Coming up, this pregnant woman vanished last month after her husband ditched her in the freezing cold on the side of a rural road. Tonight, her situation has changed from a missing person's case to a criminal investigation. We'll tell you why.

"Good Morning America," ABC, 1/10/2006

DIANE SAWYER (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) And this morning New York Senator Hilary Rodham Clinton joins us. She has called for an investigation in all this, and she's at her home in Chappaqua, New York. Thank you, Senator Clinton, for being with us this morning. I want to get right to it.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Morning.

GRAPHICS: BODY ARMOR: STILL ON THE CASE

GRAPHICS: WHY AREN'T TROOPS MORE PROTECTED?

DIANE SAWYER (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Because you have called on the Pentagon to make the additional armor available expeditiously. Have you gotten any reaction from the Pentagon?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Well, Diane, this is the last of many requests that not only I, but a number of my colleagues in the Congress, parents, soldiers and Marines and others have made on their own behalf over the last, now, nearly three years. And it just is heartbreaking to me that, once again, we have a study that looked at the wounds that Marines suffered and concluded, as you rightly said, that we, perhaps, could have avoided so many of these fatalities with the right body armor. The problem is that we have not provided that body armor in a timely way. We have not given many of our soldiers and Marines the protection that they need. And it is just unforgivable and unacceptable. So, we're looking for answers, and I hope that finally we will get them.

DIANE SAWYER (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) The Army has issued a statement, the Department of Defense has issued a statement. They have both said roughly the same thing, that they continue to develop improvements to soldier protection equipment, but they also add 'they won't discuss these issues in public because it might render insight to the enemy and aid the enemy in some way.' Does this aid the enemy to discuss this publicly?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Of course not. In fact, this has been discussed publicly for nearly three years. We've had numerous investigations. We've had parents contacting my office as well as many others, asking for advice and help. We've had parents going online. We passed legislation, Diane, that the Pentagon yet has to enforce where we said pay back the parents, the spouses, the members of the military themselves who've actually gone out and bought their own body armor. You know, it is our duty to protect our men and women in uniform. They're over there protecting us, protecting our interests. They've been sent there by our president. The very least we can do is to give them the option of having the very best body armor and armored vehicles to make sure that while they're harm's way they can be as safe as possible.

DIANE SAWYER (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) Another issue that's been raised, the cost. Is the cost prohibitive for 130,000 troops?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

You know, we spend, between regular appropriations and special so-called emergency supplementals, nearly a half a trillion dollars on defense right now. And it costs about $260 to provide the additional parts that are needed to protect the sides of our soldiers, Marines and others. And, you know, I don't think you can put any kind of price tag on the life of one of our men or women in the military. So, of course not. It is completely affordable within the enormous amount of money that we are spending right now.

DIANE SAWYER (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) The head of the Democratic National Committee, Howard Dean, has said that, that secretary of defense Rumsfeld should resign, and he cited this specifically. I'm gonna play a clip of what he said.

HOWARD DEAN (DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN)

They were requested that from the field, the Pentagon refused. You know, I, two years ago I thought Secretary Rumsfeld ought to resign. He ought to resign.

DIANE SAWYER (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Do you agree?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

You know, Diane, this is the Bush/Cheney policy. It's up to the president who he has enforcing his policy. There's been a tremendous amount of criticism, well justified, of this policy and how it's been implemented. I've been one of the leading critics over the last several years pointing out all of the failures, the incompetence that has gone into this. You know, one of the president's own appointees, Mr. Bremmer, has recently said that he, along with many of us led by General Shinseki, then the Army Chief of Staff, said there were not enough troops to stabilize Iraq after the invasion was completed. You know, I am just bewildered as to how this president and vice president continue to isolate themselves from different points of view. They have these meetings where they're 'show-and-tell' meetings, they don't really listen, but now we find out they don't even listen to people that they send over there like Mr. Bremmer. So, the real buck stops at the top, and it's the president's policy. You know, he's got three more years in office. Some of us wish that weren't the case, but it is under our Constitution. And it's up to him to make this right. And of all the issues that he should be focused on, it is providing appropriate protection to our men and women in uniform. You know, the president speaks out strongly, and even harshly from time to time, about issues that he thinks are important. Let's hear him speak out about protecting the men and women who wear the uniform of our country.

DIANE SAWYER (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Senator, thank you again for joining us this morning. And as we have said to our viewers over and over again, we're not finished. We will stay on this case. Robin?

NEWS CONFERENCE WITH SENATOR JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER (D-WV); SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY); SENATOR FRANK LAUTENBERG (D-NJ); SENATOR CHARLES SCHUMER (D-NY); SENATOR DEBBIE STABENOW (D-MI), 1/19/2005

TOPIC: CHANGES TO THE MEDICARE PRESCRIPTION DRUG PRO-GRAM LOCATION: SENATE RADIO/TV GALLERY, THE CAPITOL, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. CLINTON: This bill and the way it's being implemented is a perfect example of what the culture of corruption and cronyism means to the average American.

Now, sometimes the problems here in Washington seem to be far removed from the everyday concerns of people going about their business around our country. But this bill, designed to shovel billions of dollars into the coffers of the pharmaceutical industry and the insurance companies, is an absolute first-class piece of evidence about how the Republicans have been doing their business and not the business of America.

This was foreseen. Senator Rockefeller has been an expert on Medicare and Medicaid for years. He sounded the alarm time and time again in the Finance Committee and on the floor of the Senate. We joined, several of us, with him in making the argument that the way this plan was being designed was guaranteed to cost more than it should have, to set up millions of elderly Americans and Americans with disabilities for a rude awakening, and that you could even argue, as I have, that this prescription drug benefit, as designed and implemented by the Republicans, will lead to the deterioration of Medicare across the board.

Obviously, I did not support this bill. I thought it was a mistake and a giveaway. It was appalling that people in the government who were in the room negotiating it withheld information, and at the same time were negotiating for themselves to go to work for the very industries that would be benefitted by the massive redistribution of money from the taxpayers to those companies.

But once it passed, I, like my colleagues, have worked to make sure that we could educate our constituents, and try to sound the alarm about the implementation. I've written several letters, as I know others have, to CMS. Senator Rockefeller and I introduced legislation back in December. I put out this booklet -- "Introduction to Medicare Part D" -- and did hearings around my state trying to help not only beneficiaries, but their families, their physicians, their pharmacists understand what was going to happen as of January 1st.

Last week I was in a pharmacy in New York City, and I went there because it was a typical pharmacy where the pharmacist had been trying to meet the needs of his customers.

And there were a group of other pharmacists who'd come from around New York City and the suburbs to join with us in making the point that customers were coming in and, when presented with their bill as to what they owed, turning around and walking out without their medication. They were coming in not knowing what plan they had been enrolled in automatically without any consultation with them.

And when the pharmacist tried to find information for them by calling the help lines, calling the Medicare help line, calling the individual plan help line, oftentimes there was no answer. The efforts went on for hours. And at the end, if they got someone, often that person could not give them good information. And to add insult to injury, the pharmacists were told they would be charged for trying to help their customers.

So I introduced legislation to reimburse the pharmacists, who have been on the front line, trying to make an unworkable system understandable and work to the best of our ability.

At the pharmacy, there was a representative from CMS, who said he'd come down to understand what was going on. I said, "Well, I'm glad you're here, and I hope you'll not only listen carefully but take back to Washington what's happening in this pharmacy, because it's being duplicated across the country."

And after that, I had a press conference call -- some of you were on it -- with the representative of the pharmacy industry in New York, who had scores of stories to tell about what was happening in the implementation.

So I was pleased when Senator Rockefeller's comprehensive bill was introduced, including my legislation to reimburse pharmacies. And I think that we'll all join with the other legislation to reimburse states, because states have had to step in and fill the gap.

This is a serious national challenge. We held out this promise of prescription drug coverage. We did it in a way that undermined from the very beginning the possibility that it would work for the people who need it the most. SENATE DEMOCRATS-MEDICARE DRUGS PAGE 18

We spent billions of dollars essentially enticing insurance companies and pharmacy benefit managers and others to come into the system. We have no guarantee that the ones in today will be in next year at this time. We have no guarantee that the drugs that appear on the formulary list will be on the list in a month or two or three. We have created confusion and complexity, and we have added billions of dollars of unnecessary costs.

You know, I can't help but compare what's happening now with Katrina. You know, Katrina was a natural disaster. The government's response was inept, incompetent and dangerous. The implementation of the Medicare Part D prescription drug benefit is a man-made disaster. The planning and implementation were not done to the level that should have been expected. And the result is that we see the same ineptitude, incompetence and very real danger to Americans.

So I hope that the administration and our friends on the other side of the aisle will join with us in passing comprehensive reform and getting back on the right track and providing the drugs that so many of our fellow Americans need.

SEN. ROCKEFELLER: Let me make one quick comment and then we'll be glad to take questions. Chuck Schumer may be offended by what I'm about to say, but I don't think so. But I am.

We've been talking on the edges about neglect of vulnerable people of the Republican plan, of inattention, and giveaways to pharmacies. What I keep thinking is, when Patty Murray brought up on the floor of the United States Senate, after it had been defeated in the Finance Committee on a party-line vote, when she brought that up on the floor of the United States Senate to provide to dual eligibles the same six-month transition that all other Medicare beneficiaries -- who were above them financially, so to speak -- were getting, it lost. It got not one single Republican vote, and thus failed.

Be happy to answer questions.

Q Senator Rockefeller, can you tell me what reaction you've gotten, if any, from the White House about this, and particularly to the point of trying to get the money to reimburse the states? Jan 19, 2006 15:08 ET .EOF

SEN. ROCKEFELLER: No, I don't know what they -- I've talked a little bit with Leavitt about it. I talked last year with the president about it. He'd given a speech to the Illinois Medical Society in which he had twice promised to make sure that dual eligibles received exactly the same care and attention in any legislation on prescription drugs that Medicare beneficiaries got. He said that wasn't true, and I sent him off of his own website his speech.

Now, are we getting help from down there? No. I think what this is, frankly, coming down to is a matter of the chaos that we predicted, the shame that we feel as having been even a part -- although opposed to all this, a part of this; the anger of the American people; and the embarrassment of the Republican Party for what they've done, that they will take up this legislation and make things better.

Q Senator Rockefeller, Senator Grassley, in the last couple of hours, said that it would be premature to take up legislation --

SEN. ROCKEFELLER: It's always premature, isn't it? (Laughter.) It's always premature. It was premature that the Titanic went down, but it did indeed disappear.

SEN. STABENOW (?): Right. That's a good point. That was good.

SEN. ROCKEFELLER: You like that --

SEN. STABENOW (?): Yeah.

SEN. ROCKEFELLER: -- sound bite? (Laughter.) You got that?

SEN. STABENOW (?): (You ?) can quote him on that!

Q How are you going to convince him that the time has come that you actually --

SEN. ROCKEFELLER: By what we're doing today, and by the fact that I'm absolutely confident that all of our offices are being swamped -- as is mine -- by disgruntled people from all over the country. You know, the phone -- you know, Debbie Stabenow is wildly popular, so of course you can't get -- talk to her phone line, so they have to stoop to calling somebody like me -- (laughter) -- but they'll do that because they're that desperate.

And you know, I think it's -- I can remember going around for two years or a year before. I took the legislation with me. It was a thousand something and 38 pages long, and I had -- I found it very helpful because I said these are all the reasons you're going to have problems in meetings with seniors. They'd read the language, and the language said to them or to me nothing. It was legislative language that was unrelated to something which they could grasp onto either with happiness or with anger. And in all cases sometimes that was delivered because it was just -- people were slipping by the point.

People have had a shotty experience in the one thing in their life they cannot fool around with and that is their health, and people are suffering because of it. And the Congress on a bipartisan basis needs to re-address this, and if both political parties don't come to understand what's going on in America and react to it, shame on us all.

SEN. SCHUMER: And by the way, this is happening -- it's not just in blue states but in red states. The amount of money that the states are paying. The 25 states that are already agreeing, a good number of them are red states, a good number of them have Republican governors. In my state alone, in one week it's cost the state $17 million. Governor Schwarzenegger estimates it's costing him $70 million.

So we believe that there's going to be a bipartisan cry for this that's going to sort of roll over any opposition.

SEN. STABENOW: I might just add in the sense of emergency that pharmacists are being told now to provide an emergency 30-day prescription in order to be able to allow people a 30-day supply while it's worked out. We're now in the middle of January. What happens on February 1 if nothing has happened? I mean, there is an incredible sense of urgency that we need to have about what is happening. And I would suggest -- you don't have to walk very far, you can walk a few blocks down the street from this building and talk to pharmacists who will give you the very same kind of story about what is happening as we are hearing at home.

Q Senator Stabenow?

SEN. STABENOW: Yes?

Q You've talked about going in -- back into Part D and writing -- having a new bill or a new program under that. Can you tell us a little bit more about that? And do you really think there's an appetite for going back into Medicare law?

SEN. STABENOW: Well, I believe, and we offered on the Senate floor the option of individuals choosing this private process or just going straight to Medicare for a Part D.

We have Part B right now. There's the A -- there's the trust fund, where you get your inpatient care and so on in the hospital and so on. Then you can sign up for Part B if you want doctor visits, other kinds of services covered. You pay a premium, a co-pay. The same thing should be available under Part D, including help for low-income seniors and the disabled. It's straightforward. If we allow Medicare, in fact, to negotiate group prices -- we have seen studies that show that famous doughnut hole could be completely covered, so that we would have a comprehensive system that is available for everybody. It would be optional. People have a right. That's what they want. People keep saying to me, "Well, why can't I just sign up for a Part B?" You know, we talk about giving them choices? The one choice they don't have under this plan is the choice they want. So I think we ought to give them that choice.

Q Regarding the proposal to reimburse states for these emergency drug claims, would those funds be deducted from the drug plans, since presumably they're supposed to be paying?

SEN. ROCKEFELLER: They would be paid for for the most part by the drug -- by the plans themselves, the plans themselves. And, you know, when you get down to that 1-800 number question -- I would assume that would be a CMS expense -- but the plans would reimburse the pharmacist with, you know, all that kind of thing.

I mean, there are people -- I said this once, but I got to say it again -- there are a lot dual eligibles who are paying co-payments, deductibles, co-insurance -- they shouldn't be paying it at all. So they're either, as I guess Debbie said, walking away or some of them may be paying it, and they have to be reimbursed. Who reimburses them? The plan.

Q Would the federal government reimburse them first, and then --

SEN. ROCKEFELLER: It's -- look, I -- Chuck said it pretty correctly. We've got asbestos coming up. There's a tendency around here that I would be glad to explain, but probably wouldn't do so very politely, to take any piece of legislation which really has significance to the country as a whole and push it off, and let's just get -- since this is an election year in particular -- let's get a whole bunch of wedge issues lined up. And frankly, that's what we're fighting about, I think.

Q You've got millions of people signing up for individual plans, private plans already. Is it your sense that the structure of this Medicare law is here to stay and you're going to have to work around it?

SEN. ROCKEFELLER: No, I don't -- I don't think it is here to stay. And I -- you know, I mean, I saw Mike Leavitt on television the other day and he was saying, well, we've made some mistakes on this. He said it's getting better every day -- five times. But the fact that he understood that there were some flaws -- he said there are some people falling through the cracks -- yeah, we're going to have to come back to this thing, and I think it's almost inevitable. And you could say that on a social experiment in health care that is so large and so significant, I mean, you know, the 6.4 million nationally -- I think of it in terms of 300,000 in West Virginia, and that's about as many as there are veterans or senior citizens. I mean, it's a huge number. I think we will come back to this. I think there will be pressure. I think there's tremendous anger out there, and it's now -- it's building even as we speak, and will continue to build until the problem is solved.

SEN. CLINTON: Could I just add --

SEN. SCHUMER: My view is -- go ahead.

SEN. CLINTON: I just wanted to add, because Jay has these numbers, and I think that they're important to stress because the administration is going around talking about 24 million beneficiaries enrolled. They are counting retiree coverage, they are counting Medicare Advantage, they are counting TRICARE and federal employee health benefit retirees. So they are counting people who are not voluntarily signing up for this new program in some plan that has been given billions of dollars to try to entice them to sign up.

SEN. SCHUMER: They're counting all the people who were --

SEN. CLINTON: They're counting everybody who was already getting retiree healthcare benefits.

SEN. SCHUMER: And the people who were randomly just given a plan; they didn't pick anything, they didn't have a choice.

I'd just say one other point in relation to your question. My view is that the plan that was passed ought to be ripped up and we ought to start all over. But that's in the longer run.

In the short run, we have to help people who are suffering right now who are either not getting their medications, cutting back on their medications, or cutting back on food or heat or something else so they can take their medications.

So to think that the fix that we're talking about solves the fundamental deep-rooted problems in the bill that was passed -- no.

And whether this Congress will do it or we have to have a new Congress to do it, we will get it done.

And just one other thing I would say. Make no mistake about it; this is going to be a large issue in the 2006 elections. Make no mistake about that, either.

FORMER PRESIDENT WILLIAM J. CLINTON AND U.S. SENATOR HIL-LARY CLINTON (D-NY) DELIVER REMARKS AT FUNERAL FOR CORETTA SCOTT KING, 2/7/2006

LOCATION: LITHONIA, GEORGIA

FORMER PRESIDENT CLINTON AND SENATOR CLINTON DELIVER

REMARKS AT FUNERAL OF CORETTA SCOTT KING, LITHONIA, GEORGIA

FEBRUARY 7, 2006

SPEAKERS: WILLIAM J. CLINTON, FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY)

B. CLINTON: I thank you for that wonderful reception. You might not feel like repeating it after you hear what I've got to say.

(LAUGHTER)

Bishop, President and Mrs. Bush, Yolanda, Martin, Dexter, Rev...

(LAUGHTER)

... we are honored to be here.

I'm honored to be here with my president and my former presidents.

(APPLAUSE)

When President Bush 41 complained that he was at a disadvantage because he was an Episcopalian...

(LAUGHTER)

... then he came up here and zinged Joe Lowery, like he did...

(LAUGHTER)

... I thought that ain't bad for one of the frozen chosen. He's done a pretty good job.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

We've had a wonderful time running around the world doing good together. And I thank the president for giving us a chance to do it.

Let me say a couple things briefly and then ask Hillary to join in these remarks.

I don't want us to forget that there's a woman in there...

(APPLAUSE)

... not a symbol -- not a symbol -- a real woman who lived and breathed and got angry and got hurt and had dreams and disappointments. And I don't want us to forget that.

You know, I'm sitting here thinking, I wish I knew what her kids were thinking about now. I wonder if they were thinking about what I was thinking about at my mother's funeral. Said all this grand stuff.

I wonder if they're thinking about when she used to read books to them, or when she told them Bible stories, or what she said to them when their daddy got killed.

We're here to honor a person.

Fifty-four years ago, her about-to-be husband said that he was looking for a woman with character, intelligence, personality and beauty, and she sure fit the bill.

(APPLAUSE)

And I have to say, when she was over 75, I thought she still fit the bill pretty good with all those categories.

(APPLAUSE)

But I think that's important.

This is a woman, as well as a symbol, as well as the embodiment of her husband's legacy and the developer of her own.

The second point I want to make is the most important day in her life for everyone of us here at this moment in this church except when she embraced her faith, the next most important day was April 5, 1968, the day after her husband was killed. She had to decide, "What am I going to do with the rest of my life?"

We would have all forgiven her, even honored her if she said, "I have stumbled on enough stony roads. I have been beaten by enough bitter rods. I have endured enough dangers, toils and snares. I'm going home and raising my kids. I wish you all well."

(APPLAUSE)

None of us, nobody could have condemned that decision. But instead, she went to Memphis -- the scene of the worst nightmare of her life -- and led that march for those poor hard-working garbage workers that her husband...

(APPLAUSE)

Now, that's the most important thing for us.

Because what really matters if you believe all this stuff we've been saying is what are we going to do with the rest of our lives?

(APPLAUSE)

So her children, they know they've got to carry the legacy of their father and their mother now. We all clap for that; they've got to go home and live with it. That's a terrible burden.

(APPLAUSE)

That is a terrible burden. You should pray for them and support them and help them. That is a burden to bear. It's a lot harder to be them than it was for us to be us growing up. Don't you think it wasn't. It may have been a glory, it may have been wonderful, but it's not easy.

So what will happen to the legacy of Martin Luther King and Coretta King? Will it continue to stand for peace and nonviolence and anti-poverty and civil rights and human rights?

What will be the meaning of the King holiday every year?

And even more important, Atlanta, what's your responsibility for the future of the King Center?

(APPLAUSE)

What are you going to do to make sure that this thing goes on?

(APPLAUSE)

I read in the newspaper today, I read in the newspaper coming down here that there's more rich black folks in this county than anyone in America except Montgomery County, Maryland.

(APPLAUSE)

What are we going to do?

This is the first day of the rest of our lives. And we haven't finished our long journey home.

The one thing I always admired about Dr. King and about Coretta when I got to know her, especially, is how they embraced causes that were almost surely lost right alongside causes that they knew if they worked at hard enough, they could actually win.

They understood that the difficulty of success does not relieve one of the obligation to try. So all of us have to remember that.

What are we going to do with the rest of our lives? You want to treat our friend Coretta like a role model? Then model her behavior.

(APPLAUSE)

And you know we're always going to have our political differences. We're always going to have things we can do.

And this has been, I must say, a brilliantly executed and enormously both moving and entertaining moment.

But we're in the house of the Lord.

(APPLAUSE)

And most of us are too afraid to live the lives we ought to live because we have forgotten the promise that was made to Martin Luther King, to Coretta Scott King and to all of us, most beautifully for me stated in Isaiah.

"Fear not, I have redeemed thee."

(APPLAUSE)

"I have called thee by thy name. Thou art mine."

We don't have to be afraid. We can follow in her steps. We can honor Dr. King's sacrifice. We can help his children fulfill their legacy.

Everybody who believes that the promise of America is for every American, everybody who believes that all people in the world are caught up in what he so eloquently called the inescapable web of mutuality, everyone of us in a way are all the children of Martin Luther and Coretta Scott King. And I for one am grateful for her life and her friendship.

Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

H. CLINTON: As we are called, each of us must decide whether to answer that call by saying send me.

And when I think of Coretta Scott King, I think of a woman who lived out her calling. She lived her life as an extension of her faith and conviction.

Now, when she met this young divinity student, and he told her what Bill has just reminded us, and proclaimed that he was looking for a woman like her to be his wife, I can imagine that she thought for a minute, "What am I getting myself into?"

(LAUGHTER)

And, in fact, she waited six months to give him an answer because she had to have known in her heart that she wasn't just marrying a young man, but she was bringing her calling to be joined with his.

As they began their marriage and their partnership, it could not have been easy. Because there they were, young, becoming parents, starting their ministry at a moment in history that they were called to lead.

Leadership is something that many who are called refuse to accept. But Martin and Coretta knew they had no choice, and they lived their faith and their conviction.

H. CLINTON: I think of those nights when she was putting the children to bed and worrying about the violence, worrying about the threats, worrying even about the bombs -- and knowing that she couldn't show any of the natural fear that any of us would feel.

The pressure that must have been for her -- and she would turn to the Lord, who would answer her call for support by reminding her of her redemption.

When she went to Memphis, after her husband was killed, I remember as a college student listening in amazement to the news reports of this woman taking up her husband's struggle on behalf of the dispossessed.

She said then -- and she lived for the rest of her life in fulfillment -- that she was there to continue his work to make all people truly free -- not just free from the obvious shackles, not just free from the legal segregation, not just free from the oppression that one can see, but truly free inside, knowing that each of us has a personal relationship with God that can take us through any darkness.

(APPLAUSE)

As we gather here to celebrate her life and mourn her passing, we do have to answer the question as to whether we would say, "Send me."

She has passed, but we must take up her burden.

We'll have to split it up, because it was a heavy burden to bear.

But together, we can carry it. We can carry on the struggle against racism and discrimination. We can carry on the fight to make sure all children know they are created equal in the sight of God.

We know...

(APPLAUSE)

... that the work of peace never ends.

So we bid her earthly presence farewell. We wish her godspeed on her homecoming. And we ask ourselves: Will we say, when the call comes, "Send me"?

I know what she would want our answer to be today.

God bless you, Coretta Scott King.

(APPLAUSE)

DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF THE SENATE HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON HURRICANE KATRINA, 2/14/2006

CLINTON: Thank you all very much for being here this afternoon.

I know well a place called Hope. Hope, Arkansas. Hope, Arkansas, has a fabulous World War II airport that has a broad, very well-constructed runway and tarmac.

And sitting at the Hope, Arkansas, airport are 10,000 FEMA trailers. And they're beginning to deteriorate. They are sitting there while people are being evicted from their hotels, while they're still looking for housing, and while they are being neglected by their government.

What are we to think of this? Well, it's not too much of a stretch to say that we're leaving the people along our Gulf Coast without help and without hope.

And we know there is a lot of work to do, and many of us have stood ready to assist our colleagues, particularly Senator Landrieu and other members of the Louisiana delegation, to get answers as to what went wrong, to make sure that people were held accountable, and to ensure that what went wrong during Katrina doesn't go wrong again in the face of natural or manmade disaster.

CLINTON: We've stood ready to provide financial assistance, to help rebuild, but certainly to get people housing and their basic necessities cared for.

The president introduced his budget last Monday after delivering the State of the Union a few days before, and it was remarkable how little attention was paid either in the speech or in the budget to the needs of the people along the Gulf Coast.

His message to the people of this country, particularly to those who have suffered the worst natural disaster in our nation's history, is you're on your own.

Thousands are still displaced. There's a stagnation of rebuilding. There's no certainty about what will happen in the impacted areas, particularly in New Orleans and in the surrounding parishes.

But we're here to say to the people along the Gulf Coast, you are not on your own.

We've seen the initial reports of the House of Representatives' investigation into what went wrong with the planning and response to Hurricane Katrina, and the findings are clear.

There was a colossal failure of leadership within the White House, the Department of Homeland Security and FEMA.

The conclusion is inescapable. The president, his senior staff, his Cabinet and other officials in his government were a major reason why we had a failed response to the distress caused by Katrina.

We're now starting to get a litany of all the things that went wrong, both the things that were not done and the things that were done but done in an incorrect manner.

We are also still hearing reports that the White House continues to stonewall ongoing investigations. It is withholding documents, testimony and information that this nation deserves in order to better protect our citizens.

I support the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee's ongoing investigation. And Secretary Chertoff will be testifying before them tomorrow.

But based on the track record thus far, it is fair to conclude that the stonewalling will continue.

Now, FEMA, which was a model agency during the Clinton administration, has been pushed into this large bureaucracy within the Department of Homeland Security.

So I have two proposals that I'm joined in by several of my colleagues, including Senator Salazar, that we believe should be enacted immediately to address the continuing problems we face.

CLINTON: Last September, I proposed creating the Katrina commission, modeled after the 9/11 Commission, which would take an independent, thorough look at what went wrong and identify problems we need to fix so that this nation is never unprepared again in the event of a cataclysmic disaster.

The Republican leadership in Congress continues to block the creation of an independent commission. It's the same thing they did with the 9/11 Commission. But we eventually were able to pass it because it became abundantly clear that the investigations that were going on would go so far and no further.

That was unacceptable then; it is unacceptable now.

Second, I introduced a bill to return FEMA to an independent, Cabinet-level agency that would report directly to the president of the United States. And the director of FEMA should have the emergency services planning and response training needed to carry out those functions effectively.

It is clear that former FEMA Director Brown, Secretary Chertoff, the president, no one in this administration was able to tell the American people who was in charge as the waters rose.

I visited many of the evacuees in Houston immediately after the hurricane struck, along with my husband. I visited the devastation in New Orleans and surrounding parishes in December with Senator Landrieu. This is just a small version of what anyone with their own eyes can see.

And we've been joined by my good friend who has been waging a valiant effort on behalf of the people that she represents, on behalf of her home. And I know that Senator Landrieu has used this picture -- reminded her of her grandmother.

And when she and I were down there together in December, we saw so much wreckage and so much loss.

CLINTON: And if I were to go back down there tomorrow with Senator Landrieu, we would still see so much wreckage and so much loss, because no one is in charge at the federal government and no one is helping to really direct the kind of rebuilding and reconstruction effort that is needed.

I strongly urge all of my colleagues to go and see for themselves. Some have, but most have not. And this is a disaster of unbelievable proportions that you have to see even to grasp how extensive it is.

I'm supporting the Baker bill, which was introduced in the Senate by Senators Landrieu and Vitter. I was very disappointed that the administration has come out so hard against it. This bill, which was sponsored in the House by the Republican congressman from Baton Rouge, is designed to help people with outstanding mortgages settle their debts and decide how best to move on with their lives. Yet this administration is opposing the bill's passage.

If we don't fix the problems that exist now, if this White House continues to stonewall investigations while keeping in place the same officials who bungled the response in the first place, then every community in this nation is at risk, if man-made, terrorist or natural disaster strikes us.

You know, the preamble to our Constitution says we are to provide for our common defense. Well, the administration likes to claim that we are safer today than we were on 9/11, but there's absolutely no concrete evidence that our response capabilities are better now than they were then.

How can you, watching, reading, listening to what happened to our fellow citizens along the Gulf, conclude otherwise?

So let's get together. Let's work across party lines. Let's make it absolutely clear that we stand with the people of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

CLINTON: They are not in limbo. They are in the United States of America. And they deserve better than what they have been given thus far.

And so I am honored to be here with my colleagues. And let me introduce Senator Landrieu.

LANDRIEU: Thank you very much.

I thank Senator Clinton for her remarks and her steadfastness in continuing to keep this issue and potential solutions before the American public.

It does feel, although we are in America, like Louisiana and the Gulf Coast is in limbo for many reasons.

One that I want to focus on today is the inadequacy of the suggestions coming from the administration relative to fixing FEMA.

Before I make a few brief remarks, let me please compliment Senator Susan Collins and Senator Joe Lieberman for the truly bipartisan, fair and tough investigations that they have going on and inquiries about what went wrong, what happened, so that we can bring relief to the people of New Orleans and south Louisiana and the Gulf Coast and, as Senator Clinton said, equally important, to try to prevent this from happening to anyone in the future:

Largest mass migration since the Civil War, 10 times the homes damaged since Hurricane Andrew and unprecedented losses of insured and noninsured properties -- just to start with.

So we are, in fact, dealing with something unprecedented. But it could happen again.

So you'd think we would be on a fast track to fixing it. But it looks like we're on a slow boat rather than a fast track.

Why do I say that? There's little, and I will provide you with any number of items specifically, but in the budget the president just laid down, or the administration laid down, does not reflect lessons learned.

LANDRIEU: We weren't looking for every fix to be reflected in the budget, but we were at least looking for some acknowledgement that this event happened, that there are some solutions.

So what I want to say is: It's one thing to make room for reform in speeches; it's another thing to make room for reform in the budget and in practice. And this budget laid down reflects very few, if any, lessons learned.

Adding personnel and a tracking system while dusting over wholesale structural deficiencies in FEMA and Homeland Security will do little to prepare us for the future. There is a better way. We must re-empower FEMA, the agency, with strong leadership, adequate manpower, training, authority and resources that were stripped from it when Homeland Security was reorganized.

We need to think about a Cabinet-level agency with the president's ear, because by Michael Brown's own testimony, he couldn't get key decision-makers to listen.

There are many other things that we need to continue to focus on. But the fact is, we need new solutions, innovative and bold approaches, something like the Baker bill, Louisiana Recovery Corporation, direct funding through an expanded and more flexible community development block grant, getting real money into the hands of competent elected leaders in the Gulf Coast area, with full accountability and transparency, instead of just throwing more money at FEMA, claiming you've done your job, and walking away while this situation exists.

So I'm glad to be joined by my colleagues. I thank Senator Clinton for continuing to keep us focused on this issue. But, again, it's not just fighting for the people of New Orleans and south Louisiana, the Gulf Coast. It's fighting to make sure that the response will be better next time and people will not have to suffer so much.

Ken?

SALAZAR: I want to just echo the comments of my colleagues here and to say that perhaps the greatest opportunity that we have as a nation is to learn from the lessons of this huge national disaster that has occurred here in our homeland.

SALAZAR: One would think that, after 9/11 and four years and billions of dollars spent on homeland security that we would be able to protect American citizens here within our own homeland.

And yet, what Katrina has demonstrated in the most vivid way possible is that we are not prepared. Over a thousand people have died and hundreds of thousands of people lost their homes.

And yet, we have an executive branch that is not willing to take an honest look at how we failed and what lessons we ought to learn.

And so, yes, I believe very strongly that Senator Clinton's efforts in pushing forward for an independent Katrina commission is the right way to go because I think, otherwise, what we are doing is we are letting down the American public on what they should expect from their government. And that is straight and honest talk and truthful answers about how we can have a strong homeland security. That is our goal, a strong homeland security.

Secondly, I very much agree with Senator Landrieu that, at the end of the day, you look at the people who have been affected in the Gulf Coast states and you look at the people affected in Louisiana and New Orleans.

We are part of the United States. You know, for me, I always speak about how it is so important, as a senator, that the words "United States" precede the word senator." And that is because we are a united country.

And yet, when we see the president mentioning the Katrina issue in, maybe, one sentence in the State of the Union, it's not deserving that kind of short shrift rhetoric.

We need to do a lot more to make sure that we are investing and reconstructing the Gulf Coast for all the people who are affected by it.

And I appreciate the leadership of my colleagues in this issue.

QUESTION: Senator Landrieu, were you distracted at all by the report that came out recently, the testimony yesterday on Capitol Hill that there are 11,000 trailers in Hope, Arkansas.

And FEMA, in their response has said that they can't get clearance to bring them into Louisiana. Can you respond to both of those things?

LANDRIEU: FEMA has the same response over and over when presented with their own incompetence, which is, "It's not our fault. It's the people down in Louisiana and the Gulf Coast."

If you look into it, you will find the way FEMA gives out contracts on trailers is somebody gets the contract to buy them, then somebody gets the contract to move them, then somebody gets the contract to install them, then somebody gets the contract to hook up the electricity.

We didn't make up those rules. Those are FEMA's rules. So if it's not working, FEMA should fix its own rules. That's number one.

So, yes, it is very frustrating.

But the second point I would make is, I think it would be ludicrous after the Second World War for someone to suggest the answer to rebuild Europe is to deliver trailers to bombed-out home sites. I mean, can anybody in this administration appreciate that what we're looking at is a war zone?

Now, don't take my word for it, think what Ted Stevens said when he went down here. He served in the Senate maybe as long as I've been born. He said he's been to war sites. He's been -- he's never seen anything like it. This is not your grandfather's hurricane. We keep trying to explain this.

These were multiple levee breaks that caused flash flooding of 10 to 15 feet of water in places it had never flooded before. Homes have collapsed from structure and from mold. And all FEMA wants to do is talk about why they can't pick up debris and why they can't deliver trailers.

And I think that Senator Clinton maybe could add a little bit from her perspective about the problems with the old solutions.

CLINTON: I just really underscore what Mary said.

You know, when Mary and I were together on December 18th, it was a week before Christmas. We went to church together, to a wonderful Catholic church that is mostly serving the Vietnamese-American community.

Across the street from the church was a big field. The church had been trying to get FEMA to agree to put trailers in that field since September, because the people had been so dispersed -- they lived fairly close to the church, but they were driving hours to come back to go to church, some of them from Texas, some from north Louisiana. They wanted to be close to the church, to use the church as the base to rebuild their homes and their businesses.

So from the church, Mary and I called FEMA together. We both spoke to the director. He said, "We'll cut through the red tape. We'll get those trailers to that church."

CLINTON: I checked on it Friday, I guess. The trailers are not there yet.

We hope the trailers will be there soon, because we were assured they were coming, the people were told they were coming. They're not there yet.

Second point: The federal government owns land in and around New Orleans. It is federal government land. Some of it is housing project, HUD land. Some of it is military land and bases.

The federal government has land. So when they constantly put up to you and others, "Well, we can't do this because we can't get everybody to agree," we don't believe that, number one. But, number two, even if it were true, there are places they could go tomorrow and put in trailers for people to be housed.

So, you know, it's just more of the same old, same old. It's the song and dance from this administration.

When President Bush when to Jackson Square and said we were going to rebuild it, we were going to stand with the people, apparently that was not communicated down the ranks, because it surely is not happening.

QUESTION: Do you think, Senator Clinton, that Secretary Chertoff should be fired or should resign because of his handling of Katrina?

CLINTON: Well, you know, that's the president's choice. The president is free to name whomever he chooses to serve in his Cabinet. And I think it's fair for people to ask what kinds of choices he's made and what sorts of orders he's given and what kind of accountability is expected in this administration?

QUESTION: A further question: You used the (inaudible) a few times in your remarks. The big story in the news yesterday and today is Vice President Cheney and how long it took the news of his shooting to come out.

Could you comment on that please?

CLINTON: Well, I don't want to comment on that directly. But let me just say that a tendency of this administration, from the top all the way to the bottom, is to withhold information, to resist legitimate requests for information, to refuse to be forthcoming about information that is of significance and relevance to the jobs that all of you do and the interests of the American people.

CLINTON: I don't think that one incident alone tells the story, but putting it all together, going back years now, there's a pattern and it's a pattern that should be troubling.

I don't care whether you're a conservative, a liberal, a Democrat, a Republican, independent: The refusal of this administration to level with the American people on matters large and small is very disturbing, because it goes counter to the way our constitutional democracy, with checks and balances and the fourth estate and all the rest of it that is supposed to keep us operating efficiently and constitutionally is supposed to work.

QUESTION: Senator Landrieu, you talked about the need for an independent commission. Do you agree that there's a need for (OFF- MIKE)

LANDRIEU: Yes, I do. And I have supported it. And I've said because it is important for the American people to really understand what happened not so much to waste time and resources in blaming, but to prevent it from happening again.

And I'm going to continue to support an independent commission. I think we saw the value of it in 9/11. I don't think anyone would disagree with the value of the independent commission in 9/11.

Now, having said that, I want to repeat my confidence in and my compliments to the way Senator Collins and Senator Lieberman have conducted their hearings. They are -- that committee is responsible for oversight to homeland security.

So these can be parallel efforts. You can continue on the ways to improve homeland security and then get an independent investigation conducted and under way. I hope we can do both.

QUESTION: Do you expect New Orleans to be repopulated in the next year?

LANDRIEU: I expect New Orleans to be repopulated. When that will occur, I don't know.

And I'm of the minority that actually thinks the city and region -- the city and region will be larger and will grow even faster.

Why do I say that? Because first of all, it's a wonderful place to live. It is one of the most unique places in all of America and you can't replace it. You just cannot replace it.

LANDRIEU: And so it has always been an attractive place for people to live, to work and to visit.

A recent book that's really touched me says, and it's "Why New Orleans Matters," says: "New Orleans is one of the few places that brings a smile to the face of people who have never even been there."

Now think about that. How many places can you say that literally people smile and they've never even been there?

It is a special city. So, yes.

Now let me say this. Many things are hampering it, but one is this notion that, unfortunately, Speaker Hastert's daughter, two days after the storm, when he said, "Why would people want to live there?," because we live five feet below sea level, or eight feet below sea level?

I just got back from the Netherlands and, can I tell you all, people live 21 feet below the sea level in the Netherlands. And they run two ports -- not one -- and one major airport three times the size of New Orleans'.

Why? Because they use their engineering and their ability and they put their money into the priorities that actually do keep their population's safe -- from water, from flooding, from storms.

You can't stop hurricanes or tornadoes or earthquakes, but you most certainly can mitigate against them -- which is what this administration is not doing. And it's all about the budget.

So we're going to give you all some information as this budget unfolds about it. But again, you can make all the promises in the world. But unless it's in the budget, it's empty, an empty promise. And a lot of this is not in the budget.

And you all are going to have to excuse me. I'm going to let Senator Clinton finish up.

QUESTION: You've been pretty critical of the Bush White House over these two days and...

CLINTON: Moi?

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: And over the weekend, Laura Bush suggested that you should have more empathy (OFF-MIKE)

Do you subscribe to that philosophy?

CLINTON: I have a lot of empathy. I've been there. I know how difficult it is. It is very, very difficult.

And certainly, since 9/11, it's been a profound challenge. And so I certainly do respect that.

In my capacity as a United States senator, I represent the great state of New York and 19 million people who have a lot of questions about the policies of the administration.

CLINTON: And I would not be doing my job if I were not asking some of those tough questions and raising some of the criticism that is necessary because I profoundly disagree with the direction that the administration is taking the country.

Thank you all.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON THE FISCAL YEAR 2007 BUDGET FOR THE DEFENSE DEPARTMENT AND THE FUTURE YEARS DEFENSE PROGRAM, 2/14/2006

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And I'd like to thank both of our witnesses for your service and your efforts on behalf of an Army which is bearing the brunt of our operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. I'd like to focus on two issues with both of you: body armor and pay problems of wounded soldiers.

Secretary Harvey, on January 9th, I sent you a letter regarding recent press reports that revealed a study by the armed forces medical examiner that suggested that more extensive armor could have saved the lives of more than 80 percent of the Marines killed by upper body wounds in Iraq between 2003 and 2005.

I ask unanimous consent that my letter to Secretary Harvey and his response be included in the record.

WARNER: Without objection.

CLINTON: In your response, you stated that the Army began development of new side plates based on enhanced small arms protective inserts last September after Army commanders in Iraq and Afghanistan identified the need for additional body armor protection. When did commanders in the two areas of responsibility first learn of the need for additional body armor? Was that also in September?

HARVEY: Senator, I don't think I really have firsthand knowledge of when they discovered that. I can just tell you that these -- we call them operational needs statements, ONS, comes from theater and that the request for a side plate came in September. Our material people went immediately to work on that, designed the side plate and how to attach it to the so-called interceptor body armor, tested it in ballistic tests and other tests and certainly tried to minimize the weight and then put into production in a matter of less than four months. So it is in production. And the first 20,000 -- 5,000 will be delivered this month. And we want to get to a rate of 20,000.

And I think I also mentioned in the letter that this is up to the commander in theater whether to use it. We really can't order him to use it. It's up to the circumstances and missions and so forth. Our job is to make it available. So we will quickly, I think, be able to make those side plates available.

That does, I think, totally -- it's an additional five pounds, Chief, I think.

So they now with those side plates have 31 pounds of armor on, which, as you may have read in the paper, is not universally accepted by our soldiers.

CLINTON: And I am well aware of that. I think that the challenge is to provide it.

HARVEY: Yes.

CLINTON: And where appropriate and commanders feel that it should be worn, that is part of the command decision, where it is optional. At least it's available so that soldiers can make a decision based on their own assessment.

But what concerns me -- and this is a point that I'd like to just zero in on. According to the Marine Corps, the Marines identified the body armor requirement in June of 2005. One of our hopes through the emphasis on jointness going back to Goldwater-Nichols is that information will be shared among the services, that decisions about procurement can be expedited.

Because clearly, if, you know, Marines are finding from their commanders that this might be necessary, then a few months later we hear that the Army is doing the same. And I just hope we can get a little more coordination on some of these issues going forward in the future that pertains to the protection of our force.

HARVEY: We were aware of that Marine study. It was performed by the Army.

CLINTON: That's what I thought.

HARVEY: Yes. So...

CLINTON: But here's why I raise it. According to an article on February 12th in the L.A. Times, there is a similar disparity existing between the Army and the Marine Corps on plans to employ the joint improvised explosive device neutralizer. According to this article, the Marines have decided to deploy the JIN prototype while the Army claims the device needs further study. Perhaps you and the general could just explain to me why do we see this disparity in the way that our commanders, Army and Marine, in the field are reacting to the need to neutralize IEDs.

And is there a process where we can better coordinate this? I mean, you know, it's the same young American body out there doing the job we sent that young man or woman to do. Is there some reason why the Army would be, you know, delaying a decision on that while the Marines felt satisfied that they could go ahead with it?

HARVEY: I think there's a -- Senator, there's some confusion on this issue. I'm familiar with the so-called JIN. We developed it at the request of theater. Multi-National Corps Iraq disapproved deployment for operational assessment pending the development of what we call tactics, techniques and procedures. I can't speak for the Marines, but we provided at their request a prototype -- actually 12 prototypes. And MMCI ruled that until these tactics, techniques and procedures are developed that they believed it was not ready for deployment yet.

And the next step is to do this operational assessment in theater. And I don't really know the details of why. But it's, again, up to the theater. And it's up to the theater commanders to say that they believe that this device is safe and it's effective. And I can't speak for the Marines, but it's my understanding that until Multi-National Corps Iraq says you can do it, it's not the Army's decision.

We provide it, and they have to develop its use, train the soldiers how to use it and ensure that, for example, it doesn't result in an accident, you know, it defeats an IED, but a soldier rolls over and there's an accident or there's a death involved. So I don't think it's as straightforward as it seems. And my understanding is until the MMCI signs off, it will not be deployed either by the Army or the Marines.

CLINTON: Well, obviously one of our great concerns on this committee has been the enemy's capacity to innovate with respect to explosive devices. And I would hope that we are putting any effort on our part on a fast track that, you know, we're not in any way getting bogged down in bureaucracy about procedures, that we're out there in appropriate circumstances with appropriate supervision trying to test these devices that we think can neutralize them.

General, did you want to add to that?

SCHOOMAKER: If you would permit me. I think I might be able to add something to it as well. First of all, you know, over two years ago, the Army on our own initiative started the joint IED task force. And we were doing that within our own resources. More than a year ago, we went forward and I personally talked to Secretary Wolfowitz and asked that OSD help us provide some top cover and expand the resources that we would have, not just money, but access into places, you know, industry and into those scientific laboratories, et cetera, that would help us with this.

Now we have this thing with General (retired) Monty Meigs at the head of it. And it is quite expansive. This joint IED defeat task force is, in fact, a joint clearinghouse for these kinds of issues. It does not mean that the services have to comply with the recommendations that come out of there. But it certainly is a way to bring things together.

Going back to the Army and Marine Corps, we're working very closely together. In fact, we're probably working more jointly together than any other services are, you know, with the Army. Although we have improved considerably across the board. The Marine Corps is fighting in different places. They fight with different tactics, techniques and procedures than we do, and they're a totally different scale. They're also not as heavily armored as the Army is. So they make decisions based upon how they operate that may be different than the way we would go about doing it.

And certainly, the scale at which they would field things makes it a little bit different than when we talk about fielding on a scale that we are. So that isn't to say that this was the right decision. And I don't know all the ins and outs of the particular issue that you've got. But I do know where the clearinghouse is and where we're having these conversations. And, you know, this is certainly something we should look into and find out, you know, what the circumstances are. I hope that helps clarify some of the...

HARVEY: Senator, I might also add that in round numbers the Congress has been very generous to support the joint IED task force. This year there's $3.5 billion devoted to this. We're about to field the next generation countermeasure IEDs, as you may know, which is another advance in technology. We continue to improve the armor of our vehicles. So we have a holistic approach.

We continue to develop tactics, techniques and procedures. We continue to look up the food chain, so to speak. You know, there's a wholesale part to these IEDs, the wholesale and the distribution. We have a whole spectrum of initiatives, both technology and tactics that we're fielding. And as the chief said, a very, very able four star retired general, Monty Meigs came back and felt so strongly about it he volunteered to head the task force up.

So I think in terms of fundamentals we have everything in place. And I can tell you from my personal experience that our institutional Army takes this very seriously. We're soldier focused, and bureaucracy is aside because we've got to get it to the theater as quickly as possible. It's got to be reliable. It can't be a false sense of security.

CLINTON: Thank you. My time is up.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Secretary Harvey, when you testified last year before this committee, I asked you about reports of payroll problems for wounded soldiers, a problem that came to my attention because of the pay problems of Specialist Robert Loria (ph), a wounded soldier from New York, who was billed for travel and expenses that he should not have owed. After I had written you a letter last year inquiring as to the extent of the pay problems of wounded soldiers, Vice Chief of Staff Cody (ph) sent me a letter saying that the Army had identified 129 wounded soldiers with payment and debt issues and that the Army was conducting follow-up audits.

In your testimony last year, you said -- and I quote -- "I hope that I'm up here next year and you're going to say I haven't heard of anything for the last three or four months," unquote. Unfortunately, that's not exactly the case.

In response to an ABC News Nightline investigation last month, an Army spokesman using Army figures said that more than 5,500 soldiers withdrawn from combat on the basis of medical issues have later experienced payroll problems. And I am deeply concerned about this.

And the information that has come to me includes the recent report about the soldier who had received serious shrapnel wounds in Iraq being $700 to cover the cost of his body armor that had been removed if he was medically evacuated, which comes on top of a news report in October that the Army had found more than 330 soldiers who were wounded and then faced with military debt and the Army had begun to process the forgiving debts claim from 99 of these. And a press report revealed that the Army has granted more than 600 requests by soldiers for debt forgiveness totaling more than $600,000.

Now, after last year's hearing, I did ask that I be kept apprised of the status of the audits of wounded soldiers. And I was given a commitment that you made to give me a comprehensive response and to keep me informed. And my staff and I followed up on this issue several times asking for answers to questions that I posed last year. Yet I have to confess I learned about the number of wounded soldiers with pay problems through the press.

Now, after these latest reports, earlier this month on February 9th, I sent you another letter about the treatment of pay and debt issues. And I ask unanimous consent that my letter to Secretary Harvey be included in the record.

WARNER: Without objection.

CLINTON: And I know that the Army has arranged a briefing with my office on this issue. However, Mr. Secretary, I would like this year a detailed response in writing from you regarding each of the issues raised in my letter of February 9th and during last year's hearing.

Now, these include how many wounded soldiers have been affected by the pay problems, what safeguards are now in place to prevent the Army from mistakenly over-paying wounded soldiers and then trying to claim debts and also asking for other payments that are not well- founded, what oversight is being conducted of the debt forgiveness process and what assistance is being provided to soldiers making the requests and finally, what benchmarks have been established to measure progress in correcting these pay problems.

Obviously, I know you share my concern that this is something that we should have zero tolerance for, that there should be every effort made to prevent these problems. If they do occur, they should be rare and they should be handled expeditiously. So I look forward to your prompt response to these questions that concern me as they did last year.

HARVEY: And I share your concerns. And we took your request seriously. I apologize for not getting back to you. It was an oversight. But we have made progress since you brought that up at your hearing in terms of auditing. There's something like 10,000 plus wounded in action and another 48,000 which we call disease non--battle injury. We have -- the Army has audited -- I'm looking here at 24,000 of these accounts of which 21,000 were deemed to be correct. Eleven thousand are now in further research. And 2 percent were found in error.

So we haven't -- I think we've made progress. We're not quite there yet. We've also arranged for the DFAST (ph) to develop a database which links medical and finance records. And also we have deployed to the Army medical centers these support teams to have face-to-face, you know, instead of calling a number, that you have a person there that you can resolve this with.

So I think, Senator, we've made progress on this issue. It's important that this be solved 100 percent. I also see that there has been 1.2 million in debt cancellation and waivers for 1,200, 1,300 soldiers. So progress has been made. We'll get you a detailed report in response to your letter.

Let me also add in regard to that soldier, Rebrook (ph) who was in West Virginia. Actually, when we heard of that, we looked into it in detail. And it ended up that he actually volunteered to give the money back. And then it was discovered that he had actually lost his interceptor body armor in battle but didn't tell anybody. And so, I think what happened was he got a little frustrated with the time it takes to reconcile.

He had a number of pieces of equipment missing. Some he lost because of his injury. And he said, "The hell with it. I'll just pay it." And then when we discovered it, we gave him the money back for the things (inaudible). So it was kind of a mess-up. But we did not charge him. He actually volunteered to pay it in order not to go through this reconciliation process. He's getting out of the Army. So I think we made him whole.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Secretary. And finally, I want to add my voice to the previous comments by my colleagues about the Army's budget proposal regarding the National Guard. But I have a slightly different concern to add to theirs. Aside from the question of end strength, there is a question of funding the force structure that the Guard needs.

As you may know, the 42nd Infantry National Guard Division, the so-called Rainbow Division headquartered in New York recently returned from Iraq. And I thank you very much, Secretary, for noting on January 18th that the 42nd Infantry Division completed the first deployment of a Guard divisional headquarters since the Korean War.

HARVEY: And I did fly to Fort Drum to meet them.

CLINTON: And I thank you for that because we were very, very proud. I saw some of them when I was in Iraq last year. And we're just extraordinarily proud. And as you put it very well, the Army could not perform full spectrum operations without the Guard and Reserves tremendous contribution.

I am now concerned about the potential impact of force structure changes on the Guard and in particular on the survival of this very proud 42nd Infantry National Guard Division that we are not only proud of, but want to see stay intact. And the idea that you could send a National Guard division to battle in its entirety that would fulfill its responsibilities with great distinction is one that, I think, says a lot about what the force structure of the Guard can be. So could you just tell us briefly what the Army's plans are regarding the Guard's force structure?

HARVEY: In terms of force structure, I think General Blum said it correctly. Our plan is 350,000 end strength and 348 in force structure. So that's the current plan, which we're operating to. And again, I can't agree with you more that the 42nd I.D. under the command of General Taluto, who is now the TAG in New York who's an outstanding soldier and leader, they did a great job. Again, we can't do it without them.

SCHOOMAKER: Senator Clinton, if I could, you've got all kind of reasons to be proud of the 42nd. And Joe Taluto was a hell of a leader. But I think that inside that story lies the essence of our dilemma. And that is how many states did it take to make that division headquarters whole and that division whole.

HARVEY (?): Is it 20?

BLUM (?): Eighteen.

HARVEY (?): Eighteen states contributed to the force.

SCHOOMAKER: So we have got to have more whole structure than that. And we want the 42nd and every other division and every brigade in our entire Army to be whole when we call them up and to be fully resourced, et cetera. So, you know, the fact that we had to infuse that many states, plus we put active and Reserve officers and NCOs inside of that structure to make it whole and that we trained it to the level that they performed at such an extraordinary level over there is a testament to the Army.

But it is also a little story in itself about what we have to fix. And that is -- that's the path that we're on. And we are committed to make it right. And so, that doesn't detract anything from the 42nd. And we're proud of them. But it does talk about what the problem is that we're trying to solve here.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON THE FISCAL YEAR 2007 BUDGET FOR ATOMIC ENERGY DEFENSE ACTIVITIES OF THE ENERGY DEPARTMENT AND THE NATIONAL NUCLEAR SECURITY ADMINISTRATION, 2/16/2006

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome, Secretary Bodman, and thank you for the partnership and work that you've done with my office on a number of issues that are of importance to New York.

I want to focus on the nuclear waste reprocessing proposal that is in your budget and that you mentioned at the end of your testimony. The Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, or is it GNEP, is that what we're calling it, the acronym?

BODMAN: That's correct. GNEP, that's our term of art.

CLINTON: OK. Now, this, as you know, is a proposal to create a global system of nuclear reactors and preprocessing plants over the course of decades that could cost tens if not hundreds of billions of dollars. I believe that this may be a well intentioned proposal, but one which has serious problems, and I don't think it holds up to the claims that the administration has made about it.

If you look at the independent research that has been done about this issue, the 1996 National Academy of Sciences report, a 2003 MIT study, and even by DOE research, we know that we're taking enormous risks going down this path. And I want to ask you just a couple of discreet questions, and if we could get through them I'd appreciate it.

One of the big concerns about reprocessing obviously is that it creates plutonium, which can be used, as we know, to make nuclear weapons. This is a problem associated with the reprocessing technologies used in France and elsewhere, and it is the reason why we have consistently opposed reprocessing.

The administration, as I understand it, is claiming that GNEP reprocessing technology would not separate the plutonium from other elements, and, therefore, that the reprocessed material would be proliferation-resistant. But that's only in comparison to other reprocessing methods. In fact, the MIT and other studies I cited concluded that conventional spent fuel is far more proliferation-resistant, the reason being it's too radioactive to be handled safely by terrorists.

So my question is this, my first question, isn't it true that any conceivable reprocessed fuel would be more easily handled by terrorists than conventional spent fuel and, therefore, doesn't reprocessing under GNEP increase proliferation risks rather than decrease them?

BODMAN: You know, I don't know the answer to that specifically, Senator. I guess I would say that the goal is to recover plutonium and other actinide materials in a form that would not be useful to terrorists. Whether they would be more useful than the spent fuel that we now have, I don't know, but I would think that the -- there would -- my best guess would be that there wouldn't be a great difference, but that's just a guess. I'd be happy to get you a more thoughtful answer on that than I'm able to provide here real time.

I just would tell you that we have run this on a batch scale out at Argon and -- not on a batch scale -- it's been a continuous reaction, but it's been on a bench scale, small scale, and it seems to work, so it's something that I believe is worthy of examination. And the problem with the spent fuel that we now have scattered all over this country, including your state, is that those materials, we've only extracted about 10 percent of the energy out of it. And the uranium has been transformed into plutonium and other actinide materials, and this is merely an effort to recover that energy in a fashion that would be proliferation resistant. And I can't comment more than that, but I'd be happy to give you an answer on it in full.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Secretary, I really appreciate that, because I think our oversight duty requires us to really understand what it is the administration is proposing and attempting to accomplish. I think we have two competing goals here. One is to find a cost-effective and safe way to increase the role of nuclear power in our energy sector and the other is to be as vigilant as possible against the potential spread of nuclear material and proliferation.

BODMAN: I agree with both of those.

CLINTON: Right. And I think we can pursue the first goal, which I'm open to, as I'm sure many people are, because of our energy challenges. But at least in my review of the information available through the National Academy of Sciences, MIT, DOE research, the reprocessing, at least as it is currently available, seems to raise more dangers and questions than answers, and there are other ways to pursue the potential for greater use of nuclear power within our energy electricity production.

You know, part of the reason I'm so concerned about this is that West Valley Demonstration Project in western New York is the site of the only U.S. commercial reprocessing effort to date. And the reprocessing occurred in the 1960s. The clean up has lasted until now. We're still not done with that cleanup. It's cost billions. And so the idea that somehow reprocessing is going to solve our waste problem, at least insofar as I'm aware of it, seems a little optimistic to say the least.

I'm also concerned about costs. You know, discretionary spending dollars are very scarce, and in the FY '07 budget, the administration spends $250 million on GNEP. That's a project with uncertain and very distant benefits in my opinion. I think the money would be much better spent in looking at some of the DOE research that is on the brink of being commercially applicable on conservation and alternative smart energy production, because we're cutting a lot of DOE programs that we know have a direct positive impact on our energy usage.

And based on DOE documents, the FY '08 and FY '09 costs would total over $1.5 billion, forcing further cuts in other programs. And then it ramps up to $1.3 billion for a 10-year demonstration phase. I've seen no DOE estimates beyond that point, but the best studies that I can find suggest that the reprocessing and transmutation of existing fuel from U.S. reactors would cost upwards of $100 billion.

So there are a number of very serious issues around this proposal about GNEP. And, Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit a series of questions in writing, because I think this is going to be one of the areas we really need to zero in on as we move through the authorization process.

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY) HOLDS A MEDIA AVAILABILITY ON DUBAI PORTS WORLD PORTS DEAL, 2/23/2006

(JOINED IN PROGRESS)

CLINTON: ... without regard to partisan affiliation. This issue affects ports down the East Coast and over to New Orleans. There are Democrats and Republicans who represent those states where those ports are. The questions raised by security experts, such as the ones I quoted, who were intimately involved in the work of the Department of Homeland Security, have not been adequately answered.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) surprised by it?

CLINTON: You know, I think the facts really are powerful. So it, in my view, should have gotten the kind of bipartisan, bicameral protest that it has triggered.

QUESTION: Senator, do you have a sense yet when you introduce this bill how broad the support is going to be, how bipartisan it's going to be, and whether you'll have enough to override a veto...

CLINTON: Well, I think the 45-day bill will be very broadly supported. And that is the first order of business.

Senator Menendez and I have deeper concerns about where we're headed with foreign government ownership, control and management of our ports. That will obviously take more investigation and probably some congressional hearings.

But the imperative to move quickly on the 45-day investigation, I would predict, unless there's some move by the administration, will be on the floor of the Congress next week.

QUESTION: Senator, you were talking quite a bit about the Byrd amendment. Do you think the administration's activity in this violated the Byrd amendment? Do you think anything illegal was done?

CLINTON: No. I don't want to say that. I think that, from my questioning, you could certainly follow the language of the amendment, which is very clear. It is a mandatory investigation if two things are present: a government-owned entity, which they admit we have here, and that this would in any way, if it could affect national security.

And basically what we heard today is that nobody in this administration thought that this could affect national security. I find that hard to believe. I think that, you know, on the face of it, it could affect national security.

QUESTION: Were your concerns allayed at all by what you heard here today?

CLINTON: Well, I must commend the chairman and the administration for bringing all these officials here. You know, it's rare that we get such an open, freewheeling opportunity to ask questions about an administration decision, and that's a very good sign, because it's been troubling, the pattern of, you know, stonewalling that has gone on in the past.

My concerns have not been allayed because I don't think that the CFIUS process accurately read the statute and applied it. And if their position is, as it seems to be, that not one person in any of these agencies raised any question that this could affect national security, then I don't know what definition of national security they're using.

I mean when you are talking about major ports being taken over by a government-owned entity, from anywhere, I think that should trigger the 45-day investigation.

Thank you all very much.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON THREATS TO U.S. NATIONAL SECURITY,
2/28/2006

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you for your last question and your response, General.

Ambassador Negroponte, I just want to try to close the loop a minute on the DPW purchase.

Were you or your staff aware of the Coast Guard Intelligence Coordination Center assessment about the many intelligence gaps that made it very difficult to infer potential unknown threats, including operations, personnel and foreign influence, when you responded to the inquiry from CFIUS about the intelligence estimate?

NEGROPONTE: As I said earlier, Senator, our report was submitted to the Department of the Treasury before the Coast Guard report. Ours was submitted on the 5th of December. The Coast Guard submitted its -- the date of its report is something like the 13th of December, if I'm not mistaken. So we were not aware of that specific report.

But I have -- and I spoke to Secretary Chertoff just this morning -- ascertained that the objections or the issues that the Coast Guard raised were resolved to their own satisfaction, because they ended up being supportive of this transaction, as was the Department of Homeland Security. And a letter of assurance and some safeguards were built into the transaction as a result of some of the issues that were raised by the Coast Guard.

CLINTON: Mr. Ambassador, as part of the 45-day review, will you be conducting a national intelligence estimate of the UAE efforts to combat terrorism domestically and internationally?

NEGROPONTE: We have not been asked to do that, Senator, and I don't know whether we can conduct a national intelligence estimate in that period of time. But we will certainly participate in the 45-day review and address whatever questions we are asked to address.

CLINTON: Would it be possible to expedite an NIE in response to a request from this committee if it were forthcoming?

NEGROPONTE: Whether it be an NIE or an assessment of some kind, I'm certain we could provide to the committee.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, it might be appropriate for you and Senator Levin to consider asking for such a request as part of the 45-day review, because we need to get this system operating more efficiently. And, certainly, if the Coast Guard is making an intelligence assessment after the DNI submits an intelligence assessment, we need to get this better focused.

And perhaps we could make such a request and it might then have the effect of having everything channeled to the DNI, and getting whatever review results would be most beneficial for the final decision.

WARNER: Senator, we will take that under advisement. And my initial reaction is I think you've made an important observation, and it's likely we'll do it.

I mentioned early when the hearing started, as a consequence of our previous briefing -- in which you were a very active participant last week -- we put in a series of legal questions to the Treasury Department and legal counsel for the Senate on the various issues that you and Senator Levin raised.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

LEVIN: I wonder if you'd just yield on that request...

CLINTON: Certainly.

LEVIN: ... because I think this is an important request, and I would just...

WARNER: You will take your full time after we opine here, yes.

(LAUGHTER)

LEVIN: Well, it won't be an opining, it'll just be a question.

I would assume that your request would ask them to go back in their assessment to pre-9/11 as to what the activities were of Dubai relative to joining the war on terrorism -- pre-Iraq, between 9/11 and the Iraq war, and post-Iraq war. Because there's clearly very different aspects to their conduct and behavior, at least from everything I've read, in those periods.

So I would assume that your request would include those periods. Is that a fair...

CLINTON: Oh, that certainly is a fair assumption, Senator Levin.

LEVIN: I knew it was...

(CROSSTALK)

LEVIN: Thank you.

CLINTON: Well stated, as always.

CLINTON: I would like to turn now back to North Korea and the development of nuclear weapons.

General Maples, last year your predecessor told me before this committee that North Korea had the ability to arm a missile with a nuclear device. Now, the ability to arm is one issue -- and obviously an alarming one. Another is whether it can be successfully delivered.

Does the DIA assess that North Korea has developed an intercontinental ballistic missile capable of delivering a nuclear warhead to the United States? If not, how many more years before North Korea has that capability?

MAPLES: We assess that they are in the process of developing an intercontinental ballistic missile that would be capable of delivering a nuclear warhead, but they have not done so yet, nor have they tested it.

CLINTON: Ambassador Negroponte, last year North Korean officials asserted that they have a nuclear weapons arsenal. They have also declared that they reprocessed the 8,000 fuel rods that had been frozen from '94 to '03, which means that over the last four years North Korea has potentially produced up to six more nuclear weapons on top of the one to two devices the intelligence community assessed they already had.

In addition, the reactor the North Koreans restarted over a year ago continues to produce plutonium, enough for about another nuclear device per year. And analysts have concluded that North Korea could have up to 12 nuclear weapons this year.

At the end of last year's hearings, at the end of last year, Senator Levin asked you to produce a comprehensive national intelligence estimate on North Korea's nuclear and long-range missile programs, because there had not been one for several years.

And I thank you and your staff for completing that estimate and sending it to the committee.

I now hope that we can update the 2002 unclassified estimate that North Korea has one to two weapons.

What is your unclassified intelligence estimate regarding the number of nuclear devices or weapons that North Korea currently possesses? Is it still one to two, or is it a new range?

NEGROPONTE: Senator, when I was asked a similar question earlier, I was reluctant to try and put a number on this.

I think you're right to point out the fact that there is this fissile material and that it's being produced regularly.

But since we don't know for an absolute fact that they have nuclear weapons, to then try and extrapolate from the fact that they have this fissile material as to exactly how many weapons they have, I think is a difficult thing to do.

NEGROPONTE: But there's no question that there's a potential there for a number of weapons.

I'm just reluctant to pinpoint a specific number because I don't want to convey the impression that we know for a fact that they have that many weapons.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Ambassador, I think, though, that there's been enough discussion of this, and certainly there has been enough testimony that creates a range.

Porter Goss testified as to a range that seemed to suggest it was more than one to two.

And it seems timely that you would publish, for the benefit of public debate, an unclassified version of the new NIE on North Korea and also publish a new update, since the last one was published four years ago before North Korea withdrew from the Agreed Framework, to the unclassified estimate of the number of nuclear devices or weapons that North Korea possesses. Because this is an ongoing debate. This is a serious security challenge. And I think the public deserves to have a base level of information on which to participate.

With respect to nuclear reactors, we know they currently operate a five-megawatt reactor. Another 50-megawatt reactor has remained under construction for some time.

And in November of last year, the Washington Post reported that during a trip to North Korea, American scientist Sig Hecker was told by the director of the unfinished 50-megawatt reactor that construction was going to start soon and implied it would be finished in a couple of years, an obviously very troubling development.

Can the intelligence community comment on whether North Korea has resumed construction of the 50-megawatt reactor?

NEGROPONTE: I suspect we can, but I don't have the answer handy at the moment, Senator, and I'll submit a response for the record.

CLINTON: And finally, with respect to the six-party talks, it's been disappointing, certainly, to me -- I assume to others, as well -- that we have outsourced our policy with respect to North Korea, to the six-party talks, which really means outsourcing it to China. I don't think that's a wise decision.

CLINTON: And let me ask General Maples, what are the military implications of the failure of the six-party talks to bring any halt -- temporary or permanent -- to North Korean nuclear activities?

MAPLES: Ma'am, we believe, of course, North Korea would continue on in the development of nuclear material and nuclear weapons, and that without the six-party talks there would be little likelihood that they would give up their nuclear program.

CLINTON: Well, I have no doubt that the six-party talks are to some extent useful, but I worry that the six-party talks have really devolved into the Chinese talks and the Chinese have their own agenda. And I'm not sure that the six-party talks is the only route we should be following to deal with North Korea.

Thank you.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome, Dr. Duke.

DUKE: Thank you.

CLINTON: We're delighted to have you here. And thanks also for your years of service.

DUKE: Thank you.

CLINTON: I think we're all committed to insuring that this program remains strong and viable and able to help as many people living with HIV and AIDS in our country as possible. I hope, too, that we don't try to expand the reach of the CARE Act by removing resources from areas which have historically been hardest hit by the domestic AIDS epidemic.

For example, the need is greater than ever in my state of New York. Although New York only has 7 percent of the nation's population, it has 17 percent of the nation's AIDS cases. Over 100,000 people living with HIV and AIDS reside in New York, more than any other state in the nation.

And the epidemic, unfortunately, shows not signs of abating. More than 7,000 new cases of AIDS were reported in New York in 2004, again, more than any other state in the nation.

In response to a letter that I sent to you in October with my colleagues in the New York delegation outlining our concerns over the president's principles, you stated that the principles are proposing to target federal funds, the most heavily impacted communities and to serve the neediest first.

Now, such a statement would seem to indicate strong administration support for a state like mine which has born the brunt of the epidemic, and yet if the administration's principles were implemented, as I understand them at this point, New York would experience decreases in funding that would terribly impact our ability to provide care and treatment to the 100,000 people we have living with HIV.

Specifically, the principles would require 75 percent of the funds to be spent on a yet to be defined list of medical services, establish a severity of need index that would take into account state spending, and make changes in the Title II formula that would shift funding away from areas with Title I eligible metropolitan areas.

Could you explain -- because it's obviously important to me, to Senator Kennedy, to California, to other states with large populations -- how the president's proposal for reauthorization would help and not hurt heavily impacted communities with demonstrated needs, like New York?

DUKE: I think that the word "principles" is the key here. We have principles that we put forth. And what we've done is we've laid out some of what we see as problems with the equity of the statute as it exists.

We are very aware of the tremendous job that New York has done and of the tremendous burden that New York bears in this epidemic.

The reason we're working with principles rather than with some kind of assertion that we have truth, beauty, justice and light on our side here -- rather what we're saying is, here's some principles and here's some things that we see are problems in the statute as it now exists.

And so what we've tried to do is we've said, for example, on the 75 percent -- of course, when I got your letter, I said, "What's going with this? What are we doing now?" And then, of course, I'm inundated with statistics. And it basically boiled down to, hey, we're already doing more than 75 percent.

Now, what of core services and so forth. You can look at -- everybody's got a list of core services. And what I wanted to know, is there any commonality? There's a lot of commonality about what core services are.

So what we're trying to find and what we're trying to put forth in these principles is, can we, working together, find a way to address the reality that a big state like New York -- with a big EMA like New York City -- needs recognition and funding to deal with the epidemic as it appears in that jurisdiction. But at the same time, we need to have some equity for the states that don't have an EMA and where we get this tremendous difference of per case funding.

And I honestly believe that all of us working together can sort our way through this to get a precise and manageable way of doing that doesn't reward bad behavior or punish good behavior and that's what we're seeking here. And we don't pretend to have all the answers, but I believe we can do it together.

CLINTON: Well, I certainly welcome your offer to work with you, because I think that's what all of us are striving for. And I would second Senator Burr's request that we look for a way to recapture funds that are not used.

We did work that out in the Children's Health Insurance Program, the S-CHIP program. And maybe that's one of the models we can look at, because we had the situation where some states were utilizing those funds and others were returning them to the Treasury and we were able to transfer those.

Now, when we look at the severity of need index, we have to also take into account the effort that state and local governments have made, which I don't think we want to discourage or disincentivizes.

We also, I think, have to take into account the impact on Medicaid, because certainly the bulk of the medical costs in New York are paid for by Medicaid, not by the Ryan White CARE Act -- with the cutbacks in Medicaid how that's going to impact the caseloads that are already on the rolls for HIV-AIDS. And I think that, again, I would just raise these as cautionary notes.

I also would hope that we could study carefully the support services. I know there are some who think that the medical services, the access to medication are really the end all and be all. But we have found in New York from a lot of trial and error -- and now some very good programs -- that nutrition services, case management services, emergency housing assistance, are really medically related and necessary services.

And so if we take the 75 percent CARE Act funding and direct it to the as yet undefined set of core medical services, how will we deal with case management and some of these supplementary services that we at least have found were necessary to keep people alive and to keep them able to go on with their daily lives when they were under tremendous health pressures?

DUKE: Well, one of the things we did in trying to look at where we are now in terms of where we're going to perhaps go, we tried to look at what were we spending money on now. And what we found was that about 29 percent of the money gets spent on health care; about 42 percent of it gets spent on pharmacy. And we included in that definition case management services.

So when we look at this definition of what's a core service, as you look across the definitions and you sort of almost play those children's games when you try to make things line up, one of the things that happens is when you line up these various lists is that you find that there are commonalities -- the idea of having outpatient services, having X-ray, having access to oral health care, mental health care, behavioral and substance abuse care. When you put all of those in, one of the things that you also find is that case management comes up on most of those lists.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Dr. Duke.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON COMBATANT COMMANDS' REQUIREMENTS IN REVIEW OF THE FISCAL YEAR 2007 DEFENSE BUDGET, 3/7/2006

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, gentlemen, for being here and for your service.

And thank you, too, General Bell, for coming and giving me an excellent briefing about the Korean peninsula. And I want to start with you, General Bell. Last week Lieutenant General Maples, director of DIA, responded in a public hearing to a question about North Korea's efforts to develop a long-range missile that could reach the United States.

He stated that North Korea is, and I quote, "in the process of developing an intercontinental ballistic missile that would be capable of delivering a nuclear warhead, but they have not done so yet, nor have they tested it," unquote.

Do you agree with General Maples' assessment? And furthermore, how far do you believe they are from developing and testing? And how best can we deter that?

BELL: Thank you, Senator Clinton. I've looked at this in some detail. The Taepo Dong II and III missiles, as we call them, are of the kind that, at least in theory, could produce intercontinental capability.

Up through the late '90s, there was a fairly active program in North Korea to develop that missile technology and potentially to test it. In the years since the late '90s, the last six years, seven years, we have seen very little activity by the North Koreans to actively continue to develop and test long-range missile systems.

There is no doubt in my mind that they have the capability to begin more technological investigation and to begin a regimen to lead to testing and potentially to lead to fielding. But there's no evidence of it right now.

The evidence that we see is in short-range missiles, most useful, quite frankly, in a conflict on the peninsula. And I could be more than happy to discuss that in some detail with you in a closed session.

But I do agree with General Maples, and I think his assessment is accurate.

CLINTON: General Bell, do you think that the Chinese have the same interest as we do in putting an end to North Korea's nuclear efforts?

BELL: Taking a good look at the Chinese relationship, first with North Korea, to see what kind of partner or ally they are with North Korea, and try to make some assessment with regard to that -- now, Admiral Fallon would also be able to address this in some detail.

But first and foremost, the relationship between the People's Republic of China and North Korea is not as active as one might think. The exercising that you would expect between the ROK -- I'm sorry, the North Koreans and the Chinese is very low and essentially not extant.

The supply of military hardware, et cetera, et cetera is very low and non-extant. And so these are all positive things. My sense would be if the Republic of Korea wanted to confront the United States with respect to nukes that it would be more engaged in a conventional sense at the baseline. But they are not.

Does North Korea have -- or do the Chinese have our interests in the six-party talks to see these talks conclude positively? It is not in the interest of China, in my view, to see the six-party talks fail. I'm not certain that they are as excited about the conclusion at an early point as we are, but they've been good hosts.

They hold the talks in Beijing. They have been positive in their comments with respect to North Korea and their desire to see this resolve peacefully. So all the members of the six-part talks, in my view, have their own agendas and their own perspectives, but they have repeatedly said in open session that they are committed to the same objectives, and that is a denuclearization of North Korea, the return of North Korea to the peaceful community of nations.

And my assessment at this point is that China is helping us in that regard as opposed to hurting us. And I'd be glad to let Admiral Fallon continue, ma'am, if you'd like.

CLINTON: I would. Thank you.

Admiral Fallon?

FALLON: Thanks, Senator. I concur with what General Bell said -- maybe just add a couple of additional comments. It seems to me that the Chinese put a premium on stability, certainly within their own country, and the potential for having instability along the border with North Korea either instigated because of actions that Korea might provoke with its neighbors over nuclear weapons or any other issue seems to me to be motivation for the Chinese to stay engaged in this process.

In my discussions with Ambassador Hill, who's our chief...

INHOFE: Would you speak more directly into the microphone? Thank you, Admiral.

FALLON: Sorry, sir. My discussion with Ambassador Hill, our negotiator in the six-party talks -- he indicates that the Chinese have been helpful, particularly in the last session, in trying to move forward in this area.

So it seems to me it's tough to get into their heads and see exactly what the calculus might be that they're using, but by all appearances it's in their interest, and they appear to be working in this area with us.

CLINTON: Admiral Fallon, what military assistance do you plan to provide to the Philippine government over the next year or so?

FALLON: Senator, we've been engaged for some time with the Philippine government in a number of areas. We're trying to help them to build the capacity to deal with the terrorist problem in the southern Philippines.

We have been working with them in a significant effort called Philippine Defense Reform. It's been undertaken by the government of the Philippines and led by their secretary of national defense, the honorable Secretary Cruz, in which they are looking at a far-reaching overhaul of their entire structure, which I think would be in their best interest and ours as well.

We're helping them on the ground with advisers in Mindanao and Sulu Archipelago, and we are working a number of military assistance cases to try to help them in a materiel condition to build up their capability, particularly airlift and in other areas that would be helpful to them in gaining a better military that might be more useful for them and for the region.

CLINTON: Well, your predecessor, Admiral Fargo, agreed to inform this committee in advance of any changes in our involvement with the Philippines and particularly with respect to conditions under which U.S. service members would be involved in combat activities. And will you honor that agreement so that we would have advance knowledge of any changes?

FALLON: Yes, ma'am, I certainly will.

CLINTON: Thank you.

General Jones, I just want to go back to a point that Senator McCain was asking you with respect to Darfur. You may remember that a year ago February we talked in Munich about the potential of NATO providing airlift.

And I know from personal conversations with you in the months since that there was a great effort undertaken to get the appropriate permission and then to find the necessary resources.

Could you just enlighten me at least on, you know, what the process was and what actually came out of that process? Because I know you worked it and pushed it. It was difficult, and we didn't really provide all that much airlift, in retrospect. I don't know what the specifics are, but I know that it hasn't been adequate, and now we're looking to see what else we can do.

What is the problem? I mean, is the problem it's an out-of-area commitment? Is the problem that our other allies in NATO are not committed to it? Can you just briefly describe what is the obstacle to doing something even as limited as airlift to the extent necessary?

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON THE QUADRENNIAL DEFENSE REVIEW, 3/8/2006

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, gentlemen. And thank you for your service. Thank you for your work.

You know, I have to confess that listening to the exchanges, reading the QDR, it is a little bit confusing, I guess I will say. There are so many issues that we can look back on over the past five years that have been very troubling.

The words are all here. You know, we've had trouble getting up- armored Humvees and body armor to our troops. We've had strategic and tactical challenges. We've had recruitment difficulties.

We've had many problems, in addition to the larger considerations that both the Chairman and Senator Levin mentioned about budgeting, which has been deeply troubling.

The failure to pay for this war, I think, has grave implications for our nation's security. We're ceding our fiscal sovereignty every single day, and passing the costs and the dangers on to our children.

So, you know, I really -- you can read this and it says all the right stuff. You can quibble with, you know, some of the strategic statements and the operational recommendations.

The problem is: How do we really vet this?

You know, it's one of the frustrations, Mr. Chairman, that I think I have as a member of what I believe to be the best functioning committee, a committee of great bipartisanship, of, you know, really very wise and comprehensive leadership on both sides of the aisle.

CLINTON: You know, at some point I think it would be useful to subject a document like this, as you have done internally, I assume, to the critiques of outside experts.

You know, in our five-minute rounds, we barely can scratch the surface. We can't get to anything beyond just the most superficial.

And this is really serious business. And it would be helpful, perhaps, to have some other witnesses who can help us really think through, are we headed in the right direction?

The questions that Senator Reed was asking are of deep concern to many of us. The force structure doesn't look large enough to carry out this multitude of responsibilities.

So I don't really have a question so much, Mr. Chairman, as a concern that it is difficult to exercise responsibilities in the format in which information comes to us.

The second point I would make is that there is a great deal in here, as there has been in the rhetoric of the administration for several years, that we're in a long war. I'm not going to argue with the description, but it strikes me that it's a very strange long war when the vast majority of Americans are not being asked to sacrifice or share the sacrifice at all.

This is the longest conflict I think we've had, perhaps since the Revolutionary War, I'm not sure, with an all-volunteer military. It is these young men and women and their leaders who are bearing the day-to-day burdens and making the sacrifices.

We continue here to act as though we're living in a parallel universe, where we're cutting taxes, almost on a regular basis, where we're spending like teenagers who stole our mother's credit card, where the defense budget is increasing, but the accountability doesn't seem to be there for the financial burdens that that imposes.

So it's not any specific issue about the QDR, because I know that this has been a long and very challenging process, but putting it into context, I think we have a lot of questions.

CLINTON: And, Mr. Secretary, you said it was above your pay grade and I appreciate that, because these decisions are obviously being made at the highest levels of the administration. But you're the person in the hot seat.

So I would just hope that we could perhaps get a slightly different perspective -- maybe bring in some experts, some people who have been there, who have some constructive criticism, just to get us a more rounded view of what our options are.

And I guess the final thing I would say is that there's a great emphasis throughout here on interagency cooperation, rebuilding our alliances -- all of which I agree with absolutely.

It strikes me, in looking at this QDR and with the work that we need to do throughout the government, that we may have gone beyond the DOD QDR and we might need a broader look that does bring to the table other stakeholders in the government -- because we've had some really serious lapses.

What happened with Katrina was really embarrassing, and we haven't yet sorted out what we need to be doing going forward.

So I think that one recommendation I might make is that we try to figure out how we would have a broader process that would look at the elements of our security that are dependent upon the cooperation and participation of other agencies and personnel within our government -- because we had a disastrous experience with the Coalition Provisional Authority, based on my observation.

And I don't know, if we were to do it again tomorrow, what would be the alternative. How would we do it better? What lessons have been learned?

So I thank our witnesses because they have labored mightily on behalf of this and there's a lot of food for thought in here. But I think that we need to put it in a broader context.

ENGLAND: Senator, if I could just respond for a minute. My only comment...

WARNER: Take all the time you want, because it's an important foundation.

ENGLAND: OK, thank you.

WARNER: I would just like to interject, before you respond, Senator Levin and I shared similar concerns -- not by way of criticism, but there may be other areas.

We have written to the GAO to review this for the committee.

CLINTON: Excellent. Thank you.

WARNER: And that review's going on.

Also, Senator, I would say that Senator Levin and I will be considering such legislation as may be required to implement sections of the QDR.

WARNER: And in that context we'll be reviewing it in a sense of -- with a critical eye.

So please respond to our colleague, if you would. And if you'd like to take time for a question or so, we have adequate time.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

ENGLAND: Senator, my comment about above my pay grade was: Is this a decision in terms of is there a supplemental, or is in the base budget? And I think that's a debatable point. But the decision's been made as supplemental.

I frankly believe there's benefits in terms knowledge in the supplementals, because we can readily defend each of the costs, where we couldn't if we did it two years ahead of time. I mean, that's sort of the fundamental issue.

But that said, again, that is above my pay grade. But I actually believe it is better in terms of the discussion.

This question of force structure: Again, force structure's not free. I mean, the most expensive part of the military is our people. I will tell you when Vern Clark was CNO and I was secretary of the Navy, our view was: We want every single sailor we need, but not one more. Because we can't afford the one more all the time.

So we have gone through a lot of analysis and understanding, and we have restructured all of the forces in terms of jointness and equipment, and we are spending a lot of money in terms of equipment.

The Army alone, the Future Combat System, is over a $100 billion at times. So you would hope that we would get a high degree of capability, effectiveness and efficiency from those kinds of expenditures.

And, frankly, my view is the responsibility is on us to realize the benefits of those investments. So I would hope that, in time, the force continues to go down as we increase effectiveness.

By the way, in the United States Air Force, many missions now are unmanned. So you can expect -- and the Air Force is planning to come down in manpower, the same as the Navy did, but also the Army's now seeing the benefits of this investment.

So my judgment is we are making informed decisions and the best (inaudible) entire leadership team across the Department of Defense.

Now, we have brought in all the other agencies of the federal government to participate. We've brought in friends and allies. There have been a lot of outside organizations that have reviewed and provided comment.

But I will tell you, if people provide a better insight, we would be more than happy. I mean, our job is to protect and defend America. And we have no (inaudible) in that regard.

ENGLAND: Regarding the long war, I mean, the Cold War was 40 years. And the Israelis have been fighting terrorism for 60 years now. So we have been in long wars before. This is a different kind of war that we fight.

As a matter of fact, once in a while, I almost feel like the term "war" is perhaps misleading, because war conjures up a certain image of tanks and soldiers and artillery and airplanes, and that's not this war. Even in Iraq today, that's not the war.

It's not about firefights at this point. It was for a very short period, but it's not at this point. So this does require new thinking. We are trying to transform, and I believe we have succeeded in transforming our thinking and our approach.

And what I would encourage -- look, this debate is very valuable. This is important. And we're not just going to do this QDR. This is, I believe, a constant reassessment, because the world is changing very rapidly.

So our view is, keep reassessing, keep redirecting. And we will need the help of the Congress to do this. It is very hard to move from one direction to the other, both within the department and I know within the Congress to move into a different direction, because we have different suppliers, different kind of equipment.

So this is going to be a joint concerted effort by the Congress and the Department of Defense. And frankly we welcome the dialogue; we welcome the debate.

Our objective is to end up with the best forces we can for our country.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you.

“Anderson Cooper 360,” CNN, 3/9/2006

As Dana mentioned, the port deal drew fire from both sides of the aisle, of course, from Senators as far apart politically as Trent Lott and Hillary Clinton. They sat down with us today -- or, actually, stood up with us today for an exclusive interview, just as the deal collapsed and the story broke.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: I have got to put this question to both of you.

Senator Clinton, I will start with you.

You have been very outspoken about the Dubai ports deal. We just learned today, the Dubai company is going to transfer port operations to a U.S. entity. Is that good enough for you?

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, we don't know the details, Anderson.

We got a one-paragraph report that said that there was going to be a transfer, but the devil's in the details. I think all of us are waiting to see exactly what that very brief description means.

COOPER: Senator Lott?

SEN. TRENT LOTT (R), MISSISSIPPI: I think we need to know more about the details. Is this some sort of a transfer? Is it an actual complete letting loose of the government control of this company?

But I think we need to do more than that, too. I still think that the -- the CFIUS, or the review process, needs to be looked at. We have found that there are some gaps there. Again, the legislation did not include the Department of Defense. I -- I think they should be in that.

I also think this is an opportunity for us to take another look at what we want to do about port security. And then the -- what happens with the company itself, I think we need to ask ourselves, do we think it's a good idea for a foreign-owned company from any country to operate our terminals?

I don't think you can reverse a contract, or lease arrangement. But, prospectively, I think we have -- we would be within our rights to have some ground rules on all of that. And that's what we should do. We should have -- we should think about this and have some intelligent legislative thought. And I think that kind of action is going to be required.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: It's fascinating to see them standing there, agreeing with each other. On that, they agree.

That is not all they agreed about today. They're also potentially on a collision course with the administration on fixing FEMA, so that this, that kind of damage, never happens again.

We will talk about it in the second part of our exclusive interview coming up. And, later, a FEMA red-tape outrage -- surprise, surprise, badly needed cadaver dogs being taken off the search for bodies because of a paperwork snafu. The state is involved. FEMA is involved. We are going to see what's really being done to try to get around the bureaucratic red tape.

COOPER: More now from our exclusive interview with Senators Hillary Clinton and Trent Lott.

On a personal level, they get along just fine. Most Senators do. But, politically, they're usually about as far apart as New York -- as a New York Democrat and a Mississippi Republican can be.

They do agree on this, however: FEMA needs fixing. And they're co-sponsoring a bill to fix it, one the White House may not especially like.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: Senator Lott, you proposed this legislation to take FEMA out of the Department of Homeland Security.

Michael Chertoff, the current head of Homeland Security, says this is a bad idea, that, basically, it will be disruptive, with less than 10 days -- less than 100 days to go before the hurricane season.

LOTT: I found that, after Hurricane Katrina, that we really had serious problems with FEMA. Now, we had an overwhelming event, but we also had an agency that had sort of been neglected.

It was undermanned, underfunded and bureaucratic, huge problems. I'm not, you know, complaining about Chertoff or the Department of Homeland Security. I just think it's another layer of bureaucracy that's not necessary. And FEMA has a unique, separate from Homeland Security, mission. So, that's why I have introduced this legislation.

And I'm glad to join with Senator Clinton in proposing that.

COOPER: Well, Senator Clinton, Republican Senator Susan Collins from Maine said -- and I quote -- "This was a failure of leadership. If you still have Michael Brown making bad decisions, it wouldn't matter if FEMA were in or out of the department."

CLINTON: Well, Anderson, the legislation that Senator Lott and I are proposing does three things.

It does make FEMA independent again. And it does give the director of FEMA direct authority to report to the president. But it also puts in qualifications and credentials that the high-level officials in FEMA have to meet.

COOPER: Senator Clinton, you know, Katrina was really the first test of this new massive Homeland Security Department. And -- and, you know, most people agree it -- it failed on -- on many levels. Why should taxpayers have any confidence in the rest of the Homeland Security Department that really hasn't been tested so far?

CLINTON: Really, we kind of mixed apples and oranges.

We have a -- a disaster-preparedness task that needs to be fulfilled that has to deal with terrorism and natural disasters. And I think that FEMA was functioning well during the '90s.

I actually warned against putting FEMA into the Department of Homeland Security at the time the department was formed because I knew that post-9/11, the new department would necessarily be focused on terrorism. And I have no argument with that. And I didn't want to see FEMA, which has to respond to floods, hurricanes and everything else, become a stepchild.

So that's one of the reasons Senator Lott and I want to take it out of the Department of Homeland Security. We believe that then we have a better chance to, you know, really put it back in the shape it was in the '90s and earlier, when both of us had previous experiences.

COOPER: But Senator Lott, I mean, shouldn't it worry some people that -- that really the first test of this department, basically, you know, FEMA, at least, seemed to fail? And that there all these other branches of this new department that haven't been tested? I mean, should Americans have a lot of confidence in it?

LOTT: I do think FEMA is unique in its role and its mission. That's why I think it needs to be separate.

Like Senator Clinton, I raised reservations when we were creating this new huge behemoth of a department, where we put a whole lot of different agencies and departments, parts of departments all in this new department. I mean, organizing a department like that is a challenge. And I think that Secretary Ridge and Secretary Chertoff have been wrestling with the requirements and I think have been doing a good job.

I just think in the case of FEMA, they just kind of got overlooked, shoved aside. A variety of reasons why it was caused. But, now look, we did this. We created this new department.

We can't blame this on somebody else. We were there at the beginning. So my attitude is, when you find there's a problem or you find you made a mistake, correct it.

CLINTON: Right.

LOTT: I'm not -- I'm not so worried in trying to fix blame for -- even for last week. I just want to know how it's going to be better next week and how are we going to be ready for the next natural disaster or terrorists.

COOPER: Can you guys actually get this legislation passed?

CLINTON: Well, we're sure going to try, because we're, what, three months from hurricane season. According to the latest reports, the Gulf is warmer than it's ever been before.

Many of us believe that the frequency and severity of storms along our coastline -- and I include all the way up to New York, because, you know, we're not exempt from our concerns about what can happen with this kind of storm -- that we need to move as quickly as possible. So we're going to do our best.

We're going to try to convince our colleagues on both sides of the aisle. We know that there is resistance to this. But I don't think we can wait.

COOPER: Is this the start of a new relationship for you two?

(LAUGHTER)

LOTT: How do we look here?

COOPER: I'm telling you, you can take this act on to the road. It's good.

LOTT: Well, the important thing is to work with people...

CLINTON: That's right.

LOTT: ... that will help you get things done. And I am a firm believer that you need to work across party aisles.

I was trying to do that this very week, working with Senator Chris Dodd. Senator Clinton and I have worked on other issues together involving the defense industries.

Look, I'll take allies anywhere I can find them. We're -- I'm not here to make a statement. I'm here to try to make a difference. And I'm glad to work with any senator that will join me in a cause that I think is the right thing to do.

COOPER: Senator Lott, Senator Clinton, appreciate it. Thank you.

LOTT: OK.

CLINTON: Thank you.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

U.S. SENATOR HARRY REID (D-NV) HOLDS A NEWS CONFERENCE ON THE DUBAI PORTS WORLD DEAL, 3/9/2006

CLINTON: I think there are three points here that I'd like to underscore. First, this issues deserves a vote in the United States Congress. And I'm hopeful that the majority will permit that vote to occur.

Secondly, the work on reform that Senator Dodd on our side, along with others on both sides have led, also needs to continue. This is a very important issue for our country.

And thirdly, Senator Menendez and I have a somewhat broader view of this, because we have legislation that we would also like to have a vote on, at some point, that would ban foreign ownership by any foreign-controlled entity by a government from running our critical infrastructure like our ports.

CLINTON: This is not aimed at any company. It's not aimed at any country. It is aimed at trying to send a big wake-up call to our own government that we've not done but we need to do on security in our ports and so much else that has basically been neglected since 9/11.

And so, I joined with Senator Menendez under his leadership to put forth this ban on government-owned, foreign government-owned entities from owning, managing or controlling our ports.

We would like to see that also get a vote, because we think that raises the larger issue about what decisions we are making in our country that might not be in the best interests of America's security.

So I hope that we can get votes on these bills and go back to the work of the Senate on reform.

MENENDEZ: Well, thank you.

I want to just join and say that this is in fact an issue that needs a vote, the immediate vote pending, the vote that Senator Clinton talked about.

And if judges should get a vote up and down, the nation's security should get a vote up and down. And that's what this is all about at the end of the day. It's about the nation's security.

If the details of the Dubai Port World announcement -- if they are truly transferring all of their assets to a U.S. company and they are making a full divestiture in which both operation, ownership and control are totally divested, that may very well be good news.

But we don't know. If all they're doing is using the word "divesting," but ultimately giving it to an American subsidiary for which they have any ability to exert any ability to exert any control, that doesn't achieve the goal.

That's why the pending amendment creates, in this specific instance, the opportunity to obviate the deal with certainty. It is a guarantee to the American people that this deal will not move forward.

And I find it so difficult to understand why the majority cannot let the will of the American people, as fully expressed, as it relates to Dubai Ports World and this broader issue of port security, have its way on the floor of the Senate.

Lastly, I do want to echo Senator Clinton's efforts that she has joined with me and others on. Once we dispose of the Dubai Ports World deal, whether it is because they have fully divested without ownership, without control, without operations or because we have achieved it through the pending amendment of Senator Schumer, we still have to get to the greater policy question: Is it in the national security interests of the United States to have a foreign government operating the port terminals of our country in both its commerce and its security?

MENENDEZ: And as someone who previously in the House represented the port of Elizabeth and Newark, the megaport of the East Coast -- 200,000 jobs, $25 billion of economic activity that generate through that port, 5,000 foreign ships that come through that port, and 145 million tons of cargo that come to that port, of which 95 percent doesn't get inspected -- I don't want a foreign government doing that operation, especially when, increasingly, we send military supplies and equipments through commercial ports.

If Dubai Ports World were actually able to consummate this deal, 40 percent of all of the military supplies and equipment that we have sent to the men and women in Iraq who are fighting for America would ultimately be in the hands -- they would be doing the stevedoring of all that equipment and supplies.

Imagine if a foreign government that changes its minds about its views of the United States at any given moment simply said, "We're not going to perform that transaction" when that equipment and supplies is sitting there at that very moment and you need it for the men and women in the field.

It is not in the national security interests of the United States. And we hope that in addition to the pending amendment, we will get a vote on an amendment that makes it very clear that we do not believe that the ports of the United States in a security context should be in the hands of a foreign government.

REID: Senator Durbin?

DURBIN: I thank my colleagues, Senator Clinton, Senator Schumer, Senator Menendez, Senator Lautenberg and Senator Dodd.

You know, if you had had a congressional final exam about a month ago, and the essay question is: What is CFIUS and what does it do, not many of us would have passed. But we know now. We know that this obscure agency had extraordinary opportunity and power to make decisions which could literally threaten the security of the United States of America.

And now we find that the decision-making process involving the management of six of our biggest ports in the United States was made in a way that really did not give us confidence that this administration understands the sensitivity and importance of this decision.

To think that they did not give the 45-day review as required by law, did not make the report to Congress as required by law, tells me that this was really an obscure agency that wasn't being supervised closely.

We just talked to Secretary Rumsfeld in the Appropriations Committee, who really said he didn't know much about what happened with CFIUS and what they did.

Unfortunately, the secretary is one of the members of the CFIUS board. He should have known. And he should have been part of it.

We want to not only make sure we get this one right, that Dubai Ports do not run our major port facilities, as they were envisioned to do, but also to make sure we change this process. This really has to be a post-9/11 process that looks at these decisions in terms of national security.

I want to salute my colleagues for bringing this issue to the attention of the American people. And it's very clear on a bipartisan basis today that Congress has forced a result which may or may not, as we learn the details, move us in the right direction.

SCHUMER: Questions?

One other thing that we want to underscore -- just what Senator Dodd said: We want to see both. We want to see this deal undone and we want to see ethics reform. And we think we can do both and will do both.

To take several hours off and do this amendment as a separate bill, or as part of this bill, and then move on to ethics reform, as so ably managed by Senator Dodd's bipartisan compromise, is easy to do as long as the majority leader wants to.

QUESTION: Have you had a chance to talk to any of your Republican friends. The strength on this issue has been with Democrats and Republicans together. But now that the new news has come out, have you heard as to what this (OFF-MIKE)

SCHUMER: Well, the new news, if you mean that new proposal, nobody knows any details of it. I spoke to Senator Frist. He said he doesn't know the details of it.

To simply say that the U.S. entity will be separate isn't enough. How is it separate? How thick is the wall? And until we have all of those details, we can't say anything.

I'm dubious of anything where the United Arab Emirates has any control at all. And I think my colleagues would join me in that sentiment.

QUESTION: Senator, what steps do you take now to figure out those details? How will you go about doing that?

SCHUMER: Well, we want to see more than a paragraph. Senator Warner read on the floor a paragraph. He gave it to me in writing. I think others have it now, too.

And you'd have to see what the contractual basis is. In the past, what Dubai Ports World has proposed has been hardly sufficient; it looks like fig leaves. And furthermore, given the fact that at least the leader of the company seems to have so little concern about security, as is evidenced by his public statements, I think every one of us would be very dubious.

It's not to say it couldn't happen, but it has to be so well done, the wall has to be so thick, that no one would have any doubts that American ports would remain in control of American companies.

MENENDEZ: You know, if, in fact, this is a full divestiture in all of the ramifications that Senator Schumer mentioned, then it's no longer a foreign investment, if that's the case -- if that's truly the case.

In which case, this would be, if it's as being advertised, totally sold to a U.S. company, U.S. owned, U.S. operated, then it no longer is a foreign investment.

However, if it's anything short of that, then it continues to be a foreign investment. And the question is what is the foreign structure that continues to have the command and control and operation and ownership.

And so it's one or the other. And if it's one, it's very clear; if it's the other, then it may not rise to the level that we have stated as the essence of ensuring that the ports of the United States don't get operated by a foreign government. That's the very essence of the whole idea.

SCHUMER: In the past, all of the arrangements they've made have been very complicated, where the UAE ultimately keeps control. That's not good enough.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: I haven't heard the details of Senator McCain's description.

That's why I have consistently said my concern is with any foreign government owned entity.

We have to do business around the world with all kinds of countries. And oftentimes, it's in America's best interests, particularly when it comes to basing rights and other strategic military connections.

So I've tried to keep my focus where I think the debate should eventually lead, which is what is it that the United States must do for itself when it comes to protecting our homeland security here. And this is part of that debate.

So I'd like to see us move toward really focusing on critical infrastructure that is controlled, owned or operated by any foreign government.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: I don't know what the basis for his assertion was.

QUESTION: Aren't you a little concerned, given that Dubai and the UAE is a massive participant (ph) in the U.S. military, counterterrorism (inaudible). This deal was killed. Aren't you concerned about the impact that that could have on the fighting the global war on terrorism (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: I think there are legitimate concerns. I'm not going to deny that. Based on what we know from Senator Warner's description of this deal, it came about because of a decision made by the royal family in Dubai, in the UAE.

Obviously, they have made this decision because our government didn't exercise the appropriate oversight and the 45-day investigation, which put everyone in a very difficult position. And so, the owners of D.P. World have said, you know, we're going to divest. And obviously, the details of that divestment is what we're all waiting to see.

I want to underscore that there are very legitimate transactions, connections and strategic relationships with governments all over the world that I think are important to America's security.

I, though, think we have to focus here not on that -- and we have to work to maintain those relationships -- but on the larger question of whether any foreign government-owned entity should control our ports.

For me, that's an international concern. It isn't focused on any particular country. It is focused on the fundamental question of what the United States should be in charge of when it comes to port security and other critical infrastructure.

SCHUMER: Thank you everybody.

Yes, go ahead.

DODD: To the extent there's any damage done here at all, the administration has to assume far greater responsibility. Here you had 12 Cabinet agencies represented in a room and describing a transaction totally almost $7 billion with a country with some very serious national security implications in terms of our own nation.

Why no one in the room raised their hand and said, "Maybe we ought to slow down on this and think it through." To the extent there's any damage done here, the administration has to assume that responsibility in my view. And I think that's the point that needs to be made. They acted irresponsibly in that committee.

The language is so clear. Anytime a transaction involves a foreign government or where there are national security implications, there must be a 45-day waiting period. What part of that sentence didn't they understand?

DODD: And why didn't they ask for the 45 days and then go through this process?

So to the extent there's damage, look to the White House, look to the Cabinet officers who were not doing their job. That's why there's a problem.

Thank you.

SCHUMER: May I just say one word, and that is -- or two, or three.

(LAUGHTER)

But the relationship with Dubai doesn't live and die with this transaction. They have an interest in having our presence there, knowing that the United States is friendly to them.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON COMBATANT COMMANDER'S MILITARY STRATEGY AND OPERATIONAL REQUIREMENTS IN REVIEW OF THE FISCAL YEAR 2007 DEFENSE BUDGET, 3/14/2006

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I want to agree completely with Senator Inhofe's last comments. You know, many, many years ago, when I was in college, I wrote a paper about the competition between the then Soviet Union and the Chinese for military and economic influence in African Latin America. And this is like deja vous all over again.

And I think we are neglecting our neighbors to the south in a way that is going to be very difficult to repair unless we begin moving immediately. It is not only the long-term contracts that are being entered into for natural resources, it is the building of relationships, it is the funding of a number of projects -- everything from soccer fields to resort hotels.

And I think this is one of the most serious problems we face and we're not addressing it in any comprehensive way and we need, perhaps in this committee, to not only sound the alarm, but try to demand or suggest a much more comprehensive approach, starting with the undoing of the IMET restrictions. Because I think that that's sending exactly the wrong signal and it's provided a big opening.

I was encouraged when Secretary Rice seemed to at least signal some willingness to reconsider it when she was recently in Bolivia. But I hope that's on a fast track because every day we don't, more and more people take off for wherever the Chinese facilities and training are to develop those relationships.

And the same thing is happening in Africa. You know, when you've got a terrible dictator like Mugabe in Zimbabwe, telling, you know, little children in Zimbabwe they should learn Chinese because those are their new best friends -- I mean, this is a serious threat.

So I appreciate Senator Inhofe zeroing in on it.

There are so many issues to discuss with the two of you; and of course, this is the most frustrating of forums because our time and yours is so limited. And a lot of ground has already been covered that I won't replot.

But I just want, Admiral Keating, just to be sure that I understand two points that were made before I came. And I apologize for being late.

Is it your testimony that with the work that is now going on to try to enhance coordination between DOD and Guard and Reserve troops in the event of natural or manmade disasters that there are no suggested changes in posse comitatus?

KEATING: Yes, ma'am.

That's my -- that's our position.

CLINTON: It would be very helpful if that is going to be the position of the department to play out for us at some point -- not now, but some of the situations that I know we can run into.

I mean, I have a very -- I have some personal experience with this and then some observations.

And the disconnect between local law enforcement and policing functions, especially in the middle of a crisis or a disaster, is sometimes so great as to undermine the effectiveness of the military role.

And so I would like additional information, if I could. I mean, I can...

KEATING: Sure. Yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: I can go into more detail later about some of my concerns, but I was, you know -- I'm not against the position that we don't change posse comitatus. I think there are very good reasons for it, but I would like more information about how we're going to work with it; how it will, you know, in the real world, function effectively when, you know, disaster has struck.

KEATING: Can I offer an example, Senator, perhaps?

CLINTON: Please.

KEATING: In the case of Katrina, on the Friday following the storm coming ashore, General Blum reported that there were between 4,000 and 4,500 National Guardsmen who were trained in security. They were highway patrolmen at home, or sheriffs at home. They came forward and in their state active duty or Title 32 status, as you know, they have civilian law enforcement powers.

So Steve Blum moved those folks forward, and then we brought in the 82nd Airborne 1st Cav -- elements of the 82nd 1st Cav and 1124 MEU. And rather than put active-duty soldiers in the situation of finding themselves perhaps in an untenable situation, through coordination we put National Guardsmen and those local law enforcement officials that were still available and active-duty Title 10 forces in the same patrols, and allowed them to communicate back to the headquarters that the mayor and the governor and the adjutant general had set up after the accident -- or the hurricane.

So by coordinating in advance and combining the assets from the Guard and activated forces, we were able to instill a certain sense of security by the mere presence of uniformed forces, and within each of these controls were folks who did have law enforcement capabilities.

CLINTON: So they were essentially double-hatted, in effect?

KEATING: Not...

(CROSSTALK)

CLINTON: The ones who were in the Guard?

KEATING: Yes, ma'am.

Well...

CLINTON: So if they were like a police officer also in the Guard, they performed both functions in the patrol?

KEATING: They were empowered to perform law enforce -- they had the authority to perform law enforcement actions that were most assuredly not in the active-duty forces, but it was a uniform next to a uniform, next to a uniform.

And the folks of New Orleans or wherever throughout the affected area simply saw uniformed forces coming and within these patrols were embedded law enforcement authorities.

WARNER: If I might interject...

KEATING: And it worked out just fine.

WARNER: I might interject all my time because I've spent a lot of attention to this subject and it concerns me.

KEATING: Yes, sir.

WARNER: They were all wearing basically the same uniform, weren't they?

KEATING: They were, sir.

WARNER: So if an incident occurred, only the Title 32 Guard are authorized to go up and perform law enforcement functions. And the 82nd Airborne or whatever active-duty Title 10 forces simply have to step back. And that could be very confusing to the locals.

And the Title 10 people can only utilize force under those situations when they're protecting themselves, not citizens over there who need the protection of some law enforcement help.

KEATING: Chairman, there -- in the Title 10 forces, to a large extent I think you're exactly correct.

And there is the inherent right of self defense. But Title 10 forces, if they are in a situation where there is clear, urgent need to respond to protect the lives of American citizens, they have the authority to take very limited and commensurate action to save lives and mitigate human suffering.

WARNER: And perform police functions?

KEATING: In extreme cases, yes, sir.

WARNER: Now, where is the definition of what's extreme?

Because I...

(CROSSTALK)

WARNER: ... think this is a new line...

KEATING: It's not clearly defined, sir.

WARNER: Well, Senator, I join you. We're going to get this straightened out.

I have repeatedly written to the secretary of defense urging that you have a review of this and as yet have not gotten back, I don't believe, all of the responses we had hoped to receive, that they were thoroughly reviewed.

I mean, if that's going to be the policy of the country, and posse comitatus has been the law since the late 1800s...

KEATING: Yes, sir.

WARNER: ... so be it.

But in these situations, you cannot predict all the scenarios. And to have the uniformed personnel of the United States military, the Title 10, 82nd, whatever it is, unable to move in and help the citizens fend off criminals, to me, is an awkward situation.

Anyway, please continue, and you have your full time.

CLINTON: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

You know, it's a very awkward situation. And there are so many hypothetical and real incidents that we can look to, so I hope we can explore that further.

I think, Admiral Keating, you said that you're aware of the Department of Homeland Security working on a UAV project. Could you tell me a little more about that?

KEATING: I'll tell you what I know, Senator, is that before the year 2005, the Department of Homeland Security had no assets of their own. They had no UAVs, whether Predator down to small handhelds.

And I'll be happy to, for the record, give you what DHS currently has. It's my understanding they have purchased one Predator, or at least leased one Predator, and are in the process of obtaining several smaller-end, if you will, smaller, less expensive unmanned aerial systems is the term I'm told we're supposed to use now.

So DHS is aggressively pursuing increased capability in unmanned systems. And I'll be delighted to send you what DHS has and what they're expecting to have in the next year or two.

CLINTON: I would very much like to have that information.

Again, I just worry that we have so many different agencies of the government that are, you know, competing, in a sense, for assets and technology. And I don't know that that's the smartest, most cost-effective way to proceed.

So I would very much appreciate some additional information.

And if I could, Mr. Chairman, one -- I've got so many questions, but let me ask one last question.

WARNER: Why don't you take your time. We're all right, we seem to be.

Senator Collins, if you can indulge your colleague...

(CROSSTALK)

CLINTON: I don't want to take Senator Collins' time. She's a very busy person, chairing, you know, an important committee.

You know, we did have a lot of political reaction to the story about D.P. World Ports. And I think that much of it, at least from my perspective, arose because of our feelings that we're not yet as secure as we should be. And I know Senator Collins' committee is working on this.

But, Admiral Keating, what is your responsibility so that -- for example, on March 11, when the Associated Press reported a three-year, $75 million Homeland Security Department study that found cargo containers can be opened secretly during shipments to add or remove items without alerting U.S. authorities; that there have been serious lapses by private companies at foreign and American ports and aboard ships and on trucks and trains that would enable unmanifested materials or weapons of mass destruction to be introduced in the supply chain.

Number one, are you familiar with this Homeland Security Department study?

And number two, is NORTHCOM working with DHS and the Coast Guard and the other agencies to try to address these findings?

KEATING: Yes, ma'am.

We are aware of the report.

And the area where -- I've been fortunate enough to have command for a year and a half, and the domain in which we are spending more of our time pre-Katrina, I will say, is the maritime domain.

We have a Coast Guard one-star in our headquarters. The Department of Homeland Security has a flag officer and now an SES to be -- they're seeing a representative of our headquarters and we are reciprocating in kind.

We have direct access second by second to the very significant database that is maintained and shared between the Department of Defense and the Department of Homeland Security out here in Suitland, Maryland, at the Office of Naval Intelligence. Folks contributing to that database are not just military, they are all sorts from very sophisticated, highly classified systems, down to manifests that are vouched safe by the individual countries that I described in Container Security Initiative co-signees.

So it's an extensive, comprehensive system of systems that assure me that while there are cases to be sure, as mentioned in the security report, where a possibility exists for tampering with cargo or containers, the likelihood of that tampering being undetected, while not zero, is smaller than most folks would believe or expect -- expect's the wrong word -- would believe.

And I'm assured that over -- because of the ongoing, increasingly effective efforts and this large coalition of commercial, military, diplomatic and coalition partners, that our security is much better than folks might be led to believe in open-source reporting.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN ENSIGN (R-NV) HOLDS A HEARING ON GROUND FORCES READINESS IN REVIEW OF THE FISCAL YEAR 2007 DEFENSE BUDGET, 3/15/2006

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen, thank all of you for being here and for your service and for leading our young men and women so ably and well.

Obviously, because we have our young men and women in uniform in harm's way, separated from their families, we owe it to them to have open and candid discussions on the current and projected readiness of our forces.

Numerous outside studies have been conducted which have raised questions about the overall level of readiness of our ground forces, particularly in the Army, and in January 2006, a study conducted on behalf of the Department of Defense, by Andrew Krepinevich, concluded that the Army cannot sustain the pace of troop deployment to Iraq long enough to break the back of the insurgency.

He also suggested that the Pentagon's decision, announced in December, to begin reducing the force in Iraq was driven in part by a realization that the Army was overextended.

Then in January 2006, a group led by former Defense Secretary William J. Perry concluded that the strains of the nation's ground forces are serious and growing, and even went so far as to suggest that the viability of the all-volunteer force is at risk.

Now, we've had numerous discussions in this committee on restructuring efforts that the Army is undertaking to shape its forces to be better prepared, to meet the current and future challenges. We understand the plan is to create 70 modular brigade combat teams that are more capable of handling the wide range of threats that are faced.

Also, that there's a plan to shed 40,000 soldiers from the institutional Army into the operational Army to add to its combat strength without raising the end strength. And efforts to realign up to 100,000 soldiers into higher demand skills.

General Lovelace, in your testimony, you state that "to achieve this high state of readiness, we maneuver resources, dollars, equipment, and personnel to deployed and next-to-deploy forces, which result in lower resource levels among those units resetting and starting their initial train-up for future operations.

Our success in maneuvering resources to the fight is substantial," unquote. That's very ably said, General, but you could also read that as saying that perhaps we are sacrificing the preparedness of some units for others. And with both the Army and the Marine Corps indicating equipment readiness rates of 90 percent or higher, what about the equipment on hand? How is that impacting overall readiness?

General, based on your assessment and your testimony, are we in danger of undermining preparedness for some because we have to focus our resources on preparing those who are deployed and next to deploy?

LOVELACE: Ma'am, what we're doing now is, basically, we're taking the Army from a Cold War construct, not only by force structure, but how we viewed readiness. And right now, we're trying to work our way through a metric that because the data that we provide everyone uses a Cold War construct. That's why then when we say that deployed is ready, the next deployed is the next most ready, and then at some point, you have here a power that is resetting, and that is part of the discussions that we have.

That's why when we began to provide a construct of why then the supplemental dollars and what they mean to us, it allows us to push the readiness of the force from where it is now to be able to push it to make it more ready in that pool of next deployers.

Faced with the strategy (inaudible), and you know this, that we're now looking at a strategy where the Army provides a package of capabilities, and it's basically about 18-plus brigades with combat support, combat service support. This includes other kinds of enablers, whether it's patriot, et cetera. And so that part of the force is ready to go, and that part of the force is what is deployed.

And then another package sets behind it which allows to be able to surge. And when -- just like Senator Akaka asked the question about what are the readiness trends -- the readiness trends do indicate that the readiness of the force is down.

But that has to do with a lot, because of stay-behind equipment in theater, the equipment that's being reset. I talked about the fact that, you know, AMC, Army Material Command, has grown its capacity by almost 250 percent since pre-war levels. And we just finished resetting the force from the first rotation. But as we begin to sustain with the supplemental effort, inside of what is the Army Material Command, we'll be able to accelerate the reset of the force from here on out.

And so the supplemental is helping us then fuel and lube the readiness of the force, to increase the readiness of the force of the next deployers. And then also will help improve, then, the quickness in which we reset those that are just returning.

That's the basic construct. And what I can do -- and that's in the open session -- what I'll do is be happy to take on the question and get a little bit into the classified data because I think that would be helpful to you, and also allow me to seem less awkward in trying to answer and dodge the classification of the question.

CLINTON: In an open session...

LOVELACE: That's helpful or not, ma'am...

CLINTON: Well, I understand the theory, and I don't argue with the theory. The theory, you know, as you describe it eloquently, makes sense, as a theory. But where the rubber meets the road, and how you actually operationalize and implement a theory is what I'm concerned about.

And how would you respond to the concerns expressed by a number of outside expert analysts, including Krepinevich, including former Secretary Perry, that we're really stressing the military, but in particular, the Army, and that the all-volunteer military could very well be at risk.

LOVELACE: I've seen the articles -- I've read both articles, and I guess that's why when you see how we talk about -- the chief talks and the secretary talks about increasing capacity -- that's why the drawing of the capability from the number of BCTs where we were in 2003 to where we are now -- we're at about 39 -- when you start examining the ability to meet the rotational needs inside a theater, you can see by having grown that capacity, it allows us to be better able to meet what is the level of effort inside a theater right now.

And so our ability to sustain it is just that. We can't.

Now, you talked about the health of the all-volunteer force. And that's a great question. That is a serious, command is critical information requirement, something that the chief and the secretary as well as yourselves are looking at. That's why then we have well-being initiatives. We're looking at everything from building strong and ready families. We have rest and recuperative leave.

I mean, you know the well-being initiatives that we have that lie out there that begin to address the challenges that we all accept the force is under.

And just the numbers are, as I quoted a little bit earlier, is that you take the 3rd Infantry Division that just redeployed, better than 50 percent of that force wore Iraq (inaudible) patch in the theater, and another 12 percent wore a patch of another unit. Now, 62 percent of that division was combat veterans.

The fourth I.D. and the 101st, the percentage is better than 40 percent.

But then I come back and say let's look at the re-enlistment statistics and they are just huge. The third I.D., 139 percent last year while they were in Iraq. As they've come back this year, they're punching up at about 169. And so that's reflective of and how the soldiers are viewing themselves, how they're viewing how well they are being taken care of, and that's reflective of cross support. Those are just the two that I have statistics of.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you, General.

General Huly, can the Marine Corps absorb the requirement to supply 2,600 Marines for the new special operations mission while going back down to the long-term end strength of 175,000 called for in the QDR?

You know, today, as the Department starts creating this new capability, you're at a higher level of 179,000, 180,000 personnel. How does that add up?

HULY: Yes, ma'am, you're correct. Currently, we're at about 180,000 on active duty.

But what we're doing today, the Commandant is on record -- certainly I agree with him -- that we feel pretty good about that number, and that's about where we need to be to do what we're doing today. To be able to absorb not only the 2,600 embedded into the population of the 175,000 Marine Corps, but to get down to those numbers, we have instituted a capabilities assessment group that has just convened down at Quantico, Virginia, this month.

We brought together some of our finest operators and support establishment personnel to take a look at just how the Marine Corps is going to do this and probably by June we should have a readout of a road map and way ahead of how we're going to accomplish it.

CLINTON: I appreciate that, General.

HULY: And it will certainly be reported out to Congress.

CLINTON: Good. Good. Because you know, I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, that there are some reports of internal assessments of readiness that are now being classified rather than being shared with the Congress or the public. And I think we should send a very clear message that the issue of readiness is of great concern to the Congress and to the wider public, as well. So I would hope that there would not be any further efforts to classify information along those lines, so I appreciate that.

I'd like, if I could, I'd like to turn to General Vines and General Sattler, and I want to thank both of you for your service in Iraq, and General Sattler, thanks for hosting me in Fallujah. You were the most enthusiastic describer of events that I've encountered, and I still am remembering with great appreciation your success and commitment there.

But I'd like to ask each of you whether you believe that the Army and the Marine Corps could improve their jointness in operating together, as they obviously have been operating together in Iraq.

The allocation of responsibility for the western sector of Iraq to the Marines during each deployment seems to create a condition where the services don't need to operate as jointly as I would hope they could on tactical matters, at least.

On a recent visit, our staff was advised that the Army and Marine Corps supply systems were not fully integrated, so that even though both may use the same rifle or the same vehicle, if one service needed a part, they could not easily determine if the other service already had one. That's a small example, but I think that there's great operational potential, as well as cost-saving potential in continuing to work on jointness. And I would just appreciate a comment from each of you based on your experience.

VINES: Senator, I would be happy to address that.

You have put your finger on what I consider to be our single greatest weakness, not at the operation level, but at the strategic level.

General Sattler, when he and I served together in Iraq, we had U.S. Army companies commanded by Marines battalions which are commanded by Army brigades which are (inaudible) by Marine divisions, so it's the most joint operations to include support by Air Force and Navy air, it's the most joint operation in theater. Conventional and soft forces routinely task-organized with each other, so at the level in which we're operating in theater in both Iraq and Afghanistan -- and I've served in both places -- it is far more joint than in the 35 years that I have served.

The great 10th Mountain Division is back for its third deployment in Afghanistan. It is part of my organization, the most deployed force in the Army. And it is, again, fully joined at the tactical operational level.

But our systems, our legacy systems, logistical systems, intelligence systems, communication systems, battle command systems, still bear the stamp of services and not jointness.

You put your finger on it. If I want to send an e-mail to General Sattler, I can't currently as we're configured, looking at a global directory and say "Sattler," because he's on a different domain. That seems like a small thing, but that is just symptomatic.

So we have to move toward joint battle command, joint asset visibility, joint mobility systems that the men and women on the ground wearing the uniform are doing a brilliant job of using legacy Cold War systems to fight the 21st-century fight.

CLINTON: Thank you, General.

General Sattler?

SATTLER: Yes, Senator Clinton, and also, ma'am, I never had the opportunity to thank you on your last trip when you talked about the $100-plus million to get the reconstruction effort moving in Fallujah that that money did come in not that far long after your visit. So I know you never got back in touch, but I'm sure you had something to do with that. But it was much appreciated.

To follow what General Vines said, during all of those operations, you could not have become more joined across the theater, even though the multi-national force west has the Al Anbar province, at the time when General Vines and I were there together, there was a 155 Mississippi Rifles were fighting under the MEF. That's a complete Army Guard brigade out of Mississippi. The 2nd of the 28th is in Ramadi. That brigade commands a Marine battalion underneath it, commanded, as General Vines said, by a Marine division commander.

So it's a complete shuffling of the deck of capabilities with the individual who should be in command or charge in charge, regardless of the uniform worn underneath, ma'am.

So I think, at the operational and tactical level, we do have it. It's never been better.

And the sharing of forces if we needed anything, if all we had to do was convince General Vines that you should have to convince to cross-level forces. Forces came from the cav unit in Baghdad. They came from the Big Red One up north. We were constantly passing forces back and forth.

So I think that we could do better in some of the -- mainly the command and control and communications arena, but I think we're pushing it in that direction. It just takes time because it changes so fast. And I think we get out ahead of each other with our enthusiasm on occasion, but that's the one area I believe could be roped in better.

CLINTON: Thank you.

I would continue. I have a few more questions, if that's all right.

With respect to our pre-deployment training, as you both described the way that Marines and soldiers and even Reserve and Guard units have been really integrated, how would you assess the pre-deployment training, the cross-training, the issues about whether everybody who may end up in one of those units has the combat skills or the cultural and language sensitivities, even how you deal with the threat of IEDs. How has that training changed, and what more needs to be done?

General Vines?

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON THE JOINT STRIKE FIGHTER F136 ALTERNATE ENGINE PROGRAM IN REVIEW OF THE FISCAL YEAR 2007 DEFENSE BUDGET, 3/15/2006

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate your courtesy. This is a very busy day obviously here in the Senate.

Thank you, gentleman. Thank you all for being here.

Secretary England, I'm as interested in the process as the outcome, because one of the things we've tried to do in the committee is begin what is a very arduous task of trying to figure out ways we can streamline some of the procurement and acquisition processes.

And there has been testimony about the decision, but let me ask you, what examples can you point to as to where sole sourcing has been the optimal solution for a comparably large project?

ENGLAND: I would think in just about every case we end up with sole sourcing on most of our products. So, for example, we have one source on submarines. We have one source on aircraft carriers. We have one source on the F-18. We actually have one source on the Joint Strike Fighter. There's only one source.

I mean, we have one source in a lot of our products. Typically, there is a competition, or depending on the circumstance, early on in this case that decision was made in 1995 when all three of the competitors went forward with the Pratt and Whitney engine.

So the Pratt and Whitney engine is a carrier literally from 1995, but I would say the basic program itself, once we competed the program, the Joint Strike Fighter, and at that time three companies competed, ultimately one was selected. All three competed with the Pratt and Whitney engine and the selection was made, Lockheed Martin, the winner of the Joint Strike Fighter Program with the Pratt and Whitney engine.

And it was then -- frankly, directed by the Congress -- that we enter into another engine program. So we have been through that process, in my judgment. We've made those decisions and now it's a question of, do we bring in another engine manufacturer? And our judgment is that's not a wise decision in terms of either cost, or reliability, or benefit to the program.

CLINTON: Well, one of the things that I'm concerned about is the impact on the industrial base of these sole-sourcing contracts, because as you look over the horizon about the threats to our nation, to our military, maintaining redundant capability and capacity is an issue.

At least it is an issue for me, trying to figure out how we can maintain production, manufacturing capacity. And, you know, I worry that you just put this particular issue aside, that, you know, we are hollowing out our industrial base and I think that that's something that at least should give us pause.

I also realize in looking at what was said yesterday that this was a joint project with G.E. and Rolls Royce, and the U.K. minister of defense for procurements said there had not been any consultation with the U.K. until after the fact when they were informed.

That also concerns me, because I think that we want to encourage defense cooperation between the United States and our closest allies, and in fact the Joint Strike Fighter has been held out as an example of that cooperation.

But apparently there wasn't any confirmation -- or can you confirm what the committee heard yesterday, that there was no consultation with our partners on this decision?

ENGLAND: Well, that's correct, Senator, and frankly I believe that's the right decision.

This is an engine clearly being paid for by the United States government. I will tell you, given the choice, I think anybody if they can get something for nothing they'll take it. I mean, I understand that exactly.

So I would think that that's -- certainly there's interest in having a second engine because people benefit. There's industrial benefit from countries and companies. I understand that.

So no, we did not consult with the country specifically, although they were part of the Joint Strike -- I mean, they were part of the Quadrennial Defense Review.

So they're an integral part as a member of the team, but we did not have separate discussions in this regard because frankly this was an issue of our defense budget. This was not a question of their defense budget, it was a question of the money we spend and it is a question of tradeoffs in terms of how we spend that money.

So within our defense budget, if we decide to spend this, then we don't buy something else and we don't buy a ship or we don't buy a helicopter, we don't buy something else.

And we also have many requirements as part of the Quadrennial Defense Review still to be addressed. I mean, we have not yet addressed fully, far from fully, the Quadrennial Defense Review.

So there's still a lot of action items and issues still to be addressed that will need to be funded, and we will prioritize and try to balance that portfolio.

I believe, frankly, that's a decision that needs to be made in the Department of Defense. And while our friends and allies are very close and we share a lot with them, at the end of the day this is our cost decision.

WARNER: Would the senator yield -- not to take away any of your time -- because I was going to proceed on this line of questioning myself, but I'm astounded at your comment.

They were designated as level-one partners.

Now, the word partnership to me has a certain meaning which indicates a participatory management of some degree, and they also contributed a good deal toward the dollar cost of the R&D for that engine, the Great Britain did.

Was it understood when you put the consortium together that we had unilateral authority to proceed to make judgment calls of this magnitude without any consultation with an entity, i.e. Great Britain, designated as a level-one partner?

ENGLAND: Senator, this engine is in the program because the Congress decided to have this engine in the program.

This is not a fundamental technical decision for the program -- for the Joint Strike Fighter Program.

I want to be as straightforward as I can on this. This is a program that's a redundant engine. It is a second engine. It's not the primary. And the primary engine and the system being developed, the STOVL, will meet all of its requirements and delivered to the British government.

I mean, this is now -- this is an additional cost to the program and, in fact, this cost or this -- across the FYDP, this cost in the FYDP is more than the complete amount of money that's being paid for by the United Kingdom.

So their contribution to the program is $2 billion. Just across the FYDP, this is $2.4 billion for this program. So, I mean, they are great friends and great allies and they're going to get a magnificent airplane if they decide to buy the basic STOVL airplane.

But this is $2.4 billion that we will not spend on other equipment or delay this program, and in my judgment that is our decision to be made.

WARNER: All right.

Well, I'll return to this line of questioning and I'll direct your attention to the August contract that you let for this second engine, some $2 billion, to explain how this quick change of judgment.

Please continue with your full line of questioning, Senator.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to conclude by again asking the secretary just to explain for me on his response to the argument made yesterday by General Electric, along with some documents that were submitted to the record by G.E. and Rolls Royce, that an engine competition would not only lead to greater flexibility but would actually be more cost effective.

And they attached a matrix that suggested an engine competition would reduce the cost of the engine by 10 percent over the life of the program. And I would just be curious, Mr. Secretary, if you reviewed this analysis and what your response to the arguments made in it would be?

ENGLAND: I haven't looked at that analysis.

However, Senator, in our analysis if you save 10 percent of the cost across the program, then it still costs us more money. In other words, that does not save money.

You never recover the savings -- that is, you never recover the cost at a 10 percent recurring cost savings.

So I haven't looked at their particular analysis, but if the analysis is 10 percent, my conclusion would be it will not end up with net savings for the program.

CLINTON: And, Mr. Chairman, just for the record if we could get a specific response from the department to the arguments made in this analysis, I think that would be helpful.

Because again, I'm interested in, you know, streamlining our process, being smart, you know, being competitive where it appears that competition is in our best interest, you know, having a manufacturing capacity that actually operates here in our country on our soil, which I think is important.

So I would appreciate it, Mr. Chairman, if we could get a response to this particular analysis.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON U.S. CENTRAL COMMAND AND U.S.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS COMMAND REQUIREMENTS IN REVIEW OF THE FISCAL YEAR 2007 DEFENSE BUDGET, 3/16/2006

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, gentlemen. Thank you both for your service. And you carry the lion's weight as well as the hope for success in these current operations. And I'm very grateful to you both.

General Abizaid, there was a recent series of articles -- I guess two so far -- in the New York Times. One of the by-lines was Bernard Trainor.

In it, the narrative claimed that, during the march toward Baghdad, that the ground commanders wanted to stay and fight and wipe out the Saddam Fedayeen. But they were ordered to keep moving toward Baghdad.

I'd like to ask you, first: Based on your information, is that a correct statement? And secondly: In hindsight, are we dealing with the remnants of the Saddam Fedayeen in the Baathist part of the insurgency?

ABIZAID: Senator Clinton, I've heard a lot about it. I really haven't read what you're referring to, but I will tell you my take on the movement as a deputy commander up towards Baghdad.

I never have regarded it as either/or. There were conventional force commanders that wanted to divert some of their combat power to the lines of communication to deal with the difficulties that were clear down in Nasiriyah and other places along there before moving forward.

It was a good debate. It was one that was pretty open. And the way that I remember that we solved the problem is we diverted some of our special forces operators along the lines of communication to clean up some of that, and we felt that there was sufficient force to keep logistics flowing and continue the advance at the same time.

So that's what we did.

And, of course, people are always surprised that there's debate within military organizations. But when we're going our professional activity, there certainly is.

The question about whether or not these are the same Saddam Fedayeen, I don't think so.

ABIZAID: I regard this Sunni insurgency in particular as a loose amalgamation of Al Qaida in Iraq, Saddamists and people that I would call Sunni rejectionists that have taken an awful long time to get organized over time.

I think that there are some indications that some of the old structure of the Iraqi intelligence service continues to exist within Iraq and has linked Al Qaida in Iraq and some Saddamist rejectionists that are operating out of Syria, et cetera.

So some of those structures continue. But I've never regarded it as being a plan that the Iraqis had that's being carried out by structures that existed within the old regime.

I think people that had expertise about terrorism from the old regime continue to operate against us in, certainly in a much different ideological setting than they did during the Saddam era.

CLINTON: Thank you, General.

You know, General, on March 13, President Bush said, and I quote, "Some of the most powerful IEDs we're seeing in Iraq today include components that come from Iran," unquote.

However, at a Pentagon briefing on March 14, Joint Chiefs Chairman General Pace was asked that question: "President Bush said the revolutionary guards and IEDs and weapons are moving across the border from Iran. Do you have proof that they are indeed behind this, the government of Iran?"

And General Pace replied, "I do not, sir."

General Abizaid, do you agree with President Bush? Do you agree with General Pace?

ABIZAID: Senator Clinton, I know that you'll forgive me for not agreeing with either but to give you my own personal opinion about what the situation is in regard to the Iranians.

First of all, there's no doubt that there's Iranian intelligence activity throughout Iraq. Also, there's no doubt that there's Iranian intelligence activity in Afghanistan.

There's no doubt that components of improvised explosive devices that were manufacture in Iran have come across the border and got into the hands of Iraqi insurgents groups and been used against coalition forces.

I can't tell you whether or not that happened with the orders of the Iranian government, but I can tell you that terrorists in northeastern Iraq use the Iranian northwestern border to move back and forth across the border.

Is that a lack of capacity of the Iranian government or is that with the complicity of the Iranian government? I can't answer that question.

I clearly believe that the new government of Ahmadinejad is very ideological, has made an awful lot of threats and that we need to look very, very clearly and effectively with our own intelligence networks to determine how this flow is moving and who has authorized it, if anybody.

I think it's a very serious concern. I'm not prepared to say that I know one way or the other.

CLINTON: Would you say the same thing about the flow of people and weapons across the Syrian border?

ABIZAID: I'd say that the flow of foreign fighters across the Syrian border has decreased. And that's clear from our intelligence. We know that.

We know that the Syrians have moved against the foreign fighters. Why have they? Because the foreign fighters represent a threat to Syria. And they certainly don't want to have these organizations and groups operating within their own country that are ultimately going to be a threat to their own government.

ABIZAID: So out of self-interest, the Syrians have reacted in a way that has slowed the flow of foreign fighters. We've seen less foreign fighters in the country.

But unfortunately, the foreign fighters tend to be the most dangerous because they'll come in as suicide bombers, they'll get employed in Al Qaida in Iraq networks, and they will cause an awful lot of damage.

And of course, as you know, the Al Qaida in Iraq is trying to foment the civil war that everyone is working so hard to prevent.

CLINTON: I know that, before I could get here, Senator Levin asked a series of questions about whether or not Iraq was moving toward civil war.

And, you know, just earlier this week, the president announced the goal of having Iraqi forces control more territory than the coalition forces by the end of 2006.

How does that goal translate into what percentage of population would be protected by Iraqi forces? How does it translate into the placement of forces, whether the forces are going to be integrated by that time so that it will be representative of the population of Iraq and certainly not an impediment to stability operations because of difference in sectarian makeup of the population compared to the forces?

Could you give us a little additional information about that, General?

ABIZAID: Of course, General Casey has a pretty detailed plan that's classified that talks about where and how we'll hand off.

I can certainly tell you that, right now, the two divisions- worth, 13 brigades and 49 battalions of Iraqi security forces from the army that are controlling their own battlespace are fairly independent in those areas.

And we intend to increase that over time. I will have to take for the record and probably provide you with a classified answer on how that progresses into 2006. But it is clearly our intention, between now and December, to increase that pace of handing over battlespace to Iraqi units. And it will happen in those areas that are most ready for that to happen.

For example, if you look down in the British-controlled sector, down in the areas where the Australians, Japanese and Italians have been working, and those areas are pretty good. Some of them are ready to go toward police control, not just army control.

You look up in the northern areas, in the Kurdish-controlled areas, they're already in police control.

In the Sunni areas, like Al Anbar province, it's pretty much multinational forces in Iraq.

So it's hard to give you an answer that would be one-size-fits- all, but we clearly intend to turn over cities in particular more and more to Iraqi control. And it's our goal to -- I think Baghdad's 30 percent to 40 percent already in the hands of Iraqi security forces. We'll accelerate that process.

Our intrusiveness in cities has been a huge complaint that has come from Iraqis for a long time. We look to turn over more and more control of those cities -- and in many of the cities, you see less American presence on the streets, which is what you would expect and what you would want.

As a matter of fact, a lot of reporters that have not been in Iraq for a while who returned to Baghdad say one of the most striking things they see there is the absence of American forces in big numbers.

And that's by design. We intend to continue to do that.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN CORNYN (R-TX) HOLDS A HEARING ON U.S. NONPROLIFERATION STRATEGY AND THE ROLES AND MISSIONS OF THE DEFENSE DEPARTMENT AND THE ENERGY DEPARTMENT IN NONPROLIFERATION IN REVIEW OF THE FY2007 DEFENSE BUDGET, 3/29/2006

COMMITTEE: EMERGING THREATS AND CAPABILITIES SUBCOMMITTEE

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Well, obviously, Mr. Paul, this is a matter of great concern to us, especially in light of Linton Brooks' comments in a recent USA Today article saying that one-third of the world's 130 civil nuclear research reactors lack security upgrades needed to prevent terrorists from stealing materials that would enable them to make a nuclear device -- including even atomic bombs.

We just need to know, as precisely as you and others can lay out, how to make good on the priority that the president expressed during the '04 election -- and which many people agree with -- that, you know, preventing rogue states and terrorists from acquiring the materials necessary for nuclear weapons has to be our top priority.

Why aren't these reactors secure? And, you know, are people refusing our assistance? Are we not offering our assistance? Is there no international mechanism capable of coming in and trying to help secure these reactors?

PAUL: Well, first of all, to correct one part, I think the article could be read, could be interpreted the way that you have stated; it actually would not be completely accurate.

Administrator Brooks did not say that there were all these reactors that were without security upgrades.

Through our Global Threat Reduction Initiative and through NA-21 within the nonproliferation organization, we have a very effective program for providing the security at those reactors -- both through this administration and the previous administration, who placed attention on this as well.

We had originally identified 173 research reactors throughout the world that had highly enriched uranium in them. We started working down that list as to those that already had security upgrades with countries such as France and Canada, who take care of their own security.

And what we came up with was a list of about 106 that needed additional security upgrades and downblending from high-enriched uranium to low-enriched uranium. And we have performed those upgrades at a total of 76 sites.

Of the remaining 27 research reactors, they're currently upgrading six of these that we're working on: two in Chile, one in Mexico, Russia, Vietnam and Peru. And of the remaining 21, we have identified four new sites where security is not adequate, but we work on access.

As you know, this requires cooperation, and this subcommittee and the committee have helped us in highlighting the focus and attention on that -- and that helps us get some access. But it's hard to get into some of these sites.

But I can assure you that we are on top of these sites. We have made security upgrades in most of them. We have a program in place to downblend the uranium in them.

And as to the small number of sites that we believe need security upgrades and that we don't have access on, we are working very hard to get that access through the international regime and through other contacts and through the IAEA.

Thank you for the question.

CLINTON: I appreciate the update on that, and obviously, as you said, this subcommittee and then the full committee are very concerned and focused on this.

So any additional authority, any additional resources, I hope that you will let us know. Obviously, that has to remain one of our top priorities.

PAUL: By the way, on the small list of other sites where we don't have access, we could provide you -- in a different setting -- some information on those.

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

Mr. Paul, I want to follow up on some questions that I asked Secretary Bodman back in February when he testified before the full committee and we had a chance to discuss the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership.

During that hearing, the secretary said he would get back to me with answers to some of my questions. I haven't yet heard back, so I'll ask similar questions to you, and I hope that I will hear back from one or both.

Now, I believe that GNEP is a well-intentioned proposal to help meet the energy needs of our country and our allies and be part of a comprehensive strategy to reduce our dependence on foreign oil.

But I have some serious concerns about the program, which would create a global system of nuclear reactors and U.S. reprocessing plants over the course of decades that could cost tens if not hundreds of billions of dollars. And I am concerned about independent research that contradicts the administration's underlying claims that provide the rationale for GNEP.

I have two questions. First, studies by the National Academy of Sciences, MIT, and even the Department of Energy itself, have pointed out worrisome risks with the program.

First, we know reprocessing spent fuel creates plutonium, which can be used not only in civil nuclear energy reactors, as laid out in the plan, but also to make nuclear weapons.

The U.S. has consistently opposed reprocessing, even for our allies such as France. And while we focus on how to deal with Iran's quest to develop nuclear weapons and what to do about a nuclear-armed North Korea -- a country which as you know does use plutonium in its nuclear weapons -- I would ask, first: How do you respond to the questions and the risks laid out by the independent analysts? And do you see a contradictions between GNEP and our global nonproliferation goals?

PAUL: Not only is there not a contradiction, the two are absolutely critical for the success of each.

It is certain that the world will supply the more than doubling of the demand for nuclear power globally over the next four decades through the use of the science of the atom. The rest of the world has concluded that; that's no longer a decision for American to make, quite frankly.

The rest of the world, in order to do this, will continue to make use of the nuclear fuel cycle and will continue to recycle fuel. We no longer in America have a decision on whether that will occur.

What the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership does do, however, is provide a narrow window of opportunity where, through leadership, America can guide that in a way that improves our nonproliferation regime globally and improves the proliferation resistance of those fuel cycle processes themselves.

It is through our research and development and technology and support that we have been able to provide some enhancements to the current PUREX processes that is the current methodology whereby the fuel cycle states reprocess fuel now.

GNEP proposes a form of recycling that gives enhanced proliferation protections, does not separate plutonium. Current recycling separates plutonium into a pure stream.

What GNEP is proposing is a different model whereby plutonium is not separated into a pure stream. It continues to have these other actinides and lanthanides connected to it.

On a global setting, as I said, the rest of the world has come to the conclusion that nuclear power will be an important part of providing energy supply -- not just to America and to allies, but also to those countries who aren't our allies, who want the peaceful use of the atom.

GNEP is an opportunity to allow the peaceful use of the atom, the use of nuclear energy for energy purposes, but do it in a way so that you bring together a partnership of countries whereby those who don't have a fuel cycle can access the energy without accessing the capability that can be converted into a military threat.

That is a notion that is as old as President Eisenhower's speech in 1953 before the U.N. Assembly, and we have made some progress on it.

GNEP puts together all of these pieces, and we've been very encouraged by the support that we're getting from the global community, not only from the potential supplier states -- Russia, China, Japan, France, the U.K., and the IAEA Secretary ElBaradei -- but also from potential recipient-states, those states who might say that if we had a mechanism to access nuclear energy without developing a recycling capability in-house, we might go in that direction. Let's sit down and talk.

It's very encouraging.

CLINTON: Could I just have a follow-up on that, because as I understand the critique from various nonproliferation experts, including the MIT study that I mentioned earlier, the so-called proliferation resistance reprocessing system that GNEP claims it would promote is proliferation-resistant only in comparison to other methods of reprocessing, -- not as compared to the original spent fuel.

The spent fuel itself is actually far more proliferation-resistant than GNEP-reprocessed plutonium, because it's too radioactive to be handled safely by terrorists.

So in other words, the experts claim that the GNEP program would actually make it easier for terrorists to steal dangerous material to use in an attack.

And, you know, we're about to embark on an undertaking that could very well cost hundreds of billions of dollars. And I'm well aware of the desire on the part of many countries, including the administration here at home, to promote nuclear civilian use for energy purposes -- but I'm just worried about the trade-offs here.

You know, I mean, if we spent hundreds of billions of dollars refining coal gasification, we would provide clean coal without providing spent plutonium as a potential terrorist attack.

So, I mean, how do you make that trade-off?

PAUL: Fair question.

First of all, the purpose of these other countries in accessing the science of the atom is to provide energy. It's not to develop or promote nuclear power. It's to have electricity for hospitals and for our first responders and for schools.

CLINTON: Well, it's nuclear power to fuel electricity.

PAUL: It's to have electricity and to find a way to provide that electricity in the cleanest, safest way. And they have come to nuclear power as the one zero-emissions method for doing that.

Now the question is: Can America provide the leadership to help that new partnership be crafted globally so that it is more proliferation-resistant?

Now I think we share common concerns and goals. We may not share all the same conclusions as to the quote/unquote, "proliferation resistance" of one chemical process as opposed to another based upon a spent fuel standard.

First of all, that process that you're talking about already exists. It's what all of those countries are currently using. So to go back and say, "Well, let's compare it to not doing recycling at all" -- quite frankly, we don't have that opportunity anymore.

The rest of the world is recycling fuel and will continue to recycle spent fuel. The question is: Can we come up with a way that's even better? And can we be a player by asserting leadership?

And we think that we can. And the global partners that we've spoken to also think that, through this partnership, we can show leadership to provide a more proliferation resistant process.

Some of the studies that you're referring to, or some of the comments, have as their predicate certain assumptions that don't necessarily apply. You can design a recycle process through UREX to have whatever radiation level protection that you want, if that's the sole way that you're going to define proliferation resistance.

But proliferation is something, and nonproliferation is something, that is far greater than a mere radiation dose level at 100 rad or rem per hour, or 80 to 100 spent fuel standard. You can have UREX that is at that standard, if that's your goal.

But the safeguards technologies that America has developed and helped these countries to deploy even on their PUREX processes, has moved far beyond these earlier standards.

We have the opportunity to shift them to a more proliferation- resistant process that does not separate out plutonium and that provides safeguards and securities, verification technologies, and mass accounting that is available with this process that is not available with others.

Remember that when you keep that plutonium entrained with other isotopes, the lanthanides and the other transuranics, you have signals, signatures, additional tools that a nuclear engineer can use to ensure that there is not diversion -- tools that I do not have available to me with PUREX.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN THE HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to follow up on the line of questioning first by the chairman and then by Senator Reed.

Mr. Paul, with respect to the cost of the U.S.-Russian disposal program, what is the approximate cost? What are we talking about when you say that the Russians won't do it the way we would prefer unless they're paid for it, and the international community may not want to bear the cost?

What are we talking about in terms of dollars?

PAUL: For the Russian program?

CLINTON: Right.

PAUL: Or the Russian side? I'm hesitant to quote an exact price from their recent validated baseline. I'm thinking $2.7 billion is what they're saying.

CLINTON: So we're talking about $2.7 billion?

PAUL: I believe so.

CLINTON: And where is the source of that money if it comes internationally? Who contributes to that $2.7 billion?

PAUL: I believe that France has made a pledge of a few hundred million dollars. I don't know the exact number. I can get...

CLINTON: Yes, I'd like...

(CROSSTALK)

PAUL: ... a few hundred million dollars, because the MOX technology is of French origin. I shouldn't say that's why, but there is a connection there. They actually have that technology.

So the French have made a commitment if the fuel were MOX. There are a few others who have not made firm commitments, I believe, but have said that if the project goes forward, they would be interested in making discussion.

I don't know exactly how much money has been firmly committed by the international community. It's something that I will get to you.

It turns out I do know how much.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: Thank goodness for those people who sit behind us.

PAUL: Turns out, I'm told, that we have pledges totaling $844 million.

CLINTON: Will this be an issue for the president to raise at the G-8?

PAUL: I think that it is. It's something that we've discussed, anyway, about having that be mentioned, and it is a matter, and nonproliferation cooperation is something that the president has mentioned in international fora in the past.

I think this is an issue that the Russians will -- I don't about MOX specifically, but nonproliferation efforts is something that I believe that Russia as chair will raise as well.

CLINTON: We might want to emphasize that, Mr. Chairman, because I think, you know, your questions really go to the heart of whether the single biggest threat, the one that we were most interested in trying to address over the last several years, will be addressed and finalized at some point.

So maybe we could follow up on that.

PAUL: I appreciate that thought, too, on the G-8 summit. I will follow up with that. I will also get you a breakdown of the $844 million to tell you which countries have made those pledges.

CLINTON: I appreciate that, Mr. Paul.

Let me follow up on the line of questioning by Senator Reed.

You know, when the panel describes the various entities that are now part of our threat reduction, nonproliferation strategy, it really does sound like alphabet soup. I mean, it sounds that there are lots and lots of cooks in the kitchen. And when everybody's in charge, nobody's in charge.

And I'm concerned about duplication, I'm concerned about gaps, and I think it would be useful to get a matrix that actually lays out who is responsible for what, how they interact, what shared lines of command there may or may not be.

I very much appreciate the work that everyone is doing on this but, for example, Mr. Paul -- not to pick on you -- the Department of Energy's global initiatives for proliferation prevention program is incredibly important to ensure that WMD experts from various countries are redirected to peaceful jobs, don't end up in Iran or, you know, you name it at this point.

However, I'm also aware that the Department of State program that is focused on similar objectives. Are these programs duplicative? Are they complementary? What mechanism is in place to ensure proper coordination?

And this is just a tiny example of what I see as a very, you know, sort of broadly dispersed responsibility on the biggest threat we face.

PAUL: Well, it's a good question and a good point.

They are complementary, but if you weren't on top of them day in and day out and making sure that you have good coordination and communication, they could stumble over themselves. The programs for proliferation prevention and the complementary State program is something that this administration and the previous administration both supported, and it has been very successful.

But there is the potential for them to stumble over each other. That hasn't happened; we've worked very well together using the State Department's centers, if you will, for collecting the technical capabilities -- and our piece, which is more deploying it into the nuclear weapons facilities.

We look for scientists -- whether it be in Russian scientists, former Soviet Union scientists, Libyan, Iraqi scientists -- and we go out and try to link them up with peaceful uses, as I know you're familiar with this program.

The State Department kind of maintains a clearinghouse of that but, quite frankly, you are making a very good point that if you didn't communicate, if we didn't have such good relationship between our program and theirs, it could be difficult to manage.

CLINTON: Well, I really appreciate that.

And as I say, maybe, Mr. Chairman, our staffs could work with our witnesses and others to put forth that kind of matrix -- because, you know, everyone gives lip service to the fact that this is the most dangerous threat we face, and there are lots of those cooks in the kitchen, and I just want to know who the chef is and who the point person is. And it's, you know, it's in DOD, it's in State, it's in DOE.

So it would be helpful, at least to me, if we could try to sort that out.

My final question would really go to each of you, which is to add a layer of further complexity on this.

We do have the International Atomic Energy Agency. And the IAEA, you know, is responsible for promoting peaceful uses of nuclear technology and then ensuring, insofar as possible, that those technologies are not used to develop nuclear weapons. And it does so largely in its role as a watchdog.

Increasingly, the IAEA is playing a major international role. It, frankly, has credibility that sometimes we and our allies lack. It has access -- as it now does, for example, to Iranian nuclear sites -- that, you know, we could only dream of.

And I worry that we're not doing enough to bolster and support the IAEA and that there developed a kind of antagonistic relationship for all the reasons we know.

So let me ask each of you, starting with Secretary Flory: Is there more we could do to help bolster the IAEA by, for example, sending more U.S. personnel to Vienna, or helping to provide technology, or working better to coordinate with them?

Because I think, increasingly, we're going to need an agency like that -- given what is, I think, the appropriate warning or caution that Mr. Paul gave that we're on a fast march toward nuclear proliferation.

And I wish we could do more to rein it in. I think there are some things we could do. It may or may not be inevitable, but the fact is it's happening.

So what do we do to really bolster the IAEA as a necessary component of our efforts to try to watch that and prevent it insofar as possible?

FLORY: Senator, you raise a very good point.

The IAEA plays an extremely important role, and after decades, when it was there and frankly didn't get a lot of attention because things were kind of moving along, it came into worldview first after the first Iraq war where it was learned how much Iraq had been able to accomplish while under IAEA scrutiny.

And that led to the development of stronger safeguards by the IAEA -- and most recently in the case of Iran.

In terms of resources and things like that, I think -- I don't know if I'm allowed to do this, but if I can take your question for the record vicariously on behalf of Bob Joseph, who was unable to be here...

(LAUGHTER)

... I'm sure he'll appreciate my doing this. But State is the lead. And we'll obviously be happy to contribute to answering that question in any way we can. But since it's a diplomatic mission, they probably are the best people to pull together an answer.

I think what is tremendously important is that -- and this is again something that the State Department is in the lead for us -- is that the matter of Iran be handled successfully. I mean, the IAEA has grappled with this under the leadership, for much of that time, of a particular group of members -- but as you mentioned, it's focused attention on the IAEA.

And I think it's important for the internationally established safeguard network that the international system that we're working with be able to solve this problem.

CLINTON: Thank you.

General, do you have anything to add to that?

CARTWRIGHT: I would just say that there are certainly things that we can do in partnership. The obvious ones are training, standards, technical experts, and making sure that we're on a common sheet of music, so to speak, in advocating for those standards -- and, once they're accepted, then advocating globally for them.

Those are critical pieces. There are also pieces that we probably, in another session, we ought to sit down and talk a little bit about what we could do to assist them in setting the conditions for their ability to do their job.

CLINTON: That would be very helpful. And I'm sure that you've given thought to that, and it might be something that we could look at.

PAUL: That's actually something that the president has focused on quite a bit, increasing the funding for the IAEA, continuing to provide the technical basis and support that the IAEA and Secretary ElBaradei need.

Every one of the more than 200 nuclear weapons inspectors at the IAEA were trained at Los Alamos National Laboratory here in America. Here, within the National Nuclear Security Administration, we're very proud to continue to fund that training. They come here to learn how to do what they do to keep the world safe.

We led the way to strengthen the agency's ability to detect nuclear proliferation, and we instituted a successful effort to increase the safeguards budget.

The United States of America is the single largest contributor to the budget of the IAEA. In fact, we are even a larger contributor by percentage basis to the IAEA than we are to the U.N. We provide a quarter -- there's 128 members of the International Atomic Energy Agency, and we provide one quarter of all the funding.

We also provide, on a rotational basis, a lot of our technical experts from our national laboratories, and with Ambassador Greg Schulte, our recently sworn-in ambassador to the UNVIE, the U.N. mission there, along with our office, our DOE office there, and we have engaged in an effort to increase the number of U.S.-origin persons and experts that go to the IAEA and work internally.

It's something that I've spoken personally with Director ElBaradei about. I have one deputy director general on his board who is American, who's actually the deputy director general for management for the IAEA, and I am in a process right now of increasing the number of technical experts that we send over there.

These are excellent points and they are things that we are working on on a day-to-day basis. And I think that it's a good testament to the leadership of the president, the leadership of Director ElBaradei.

We've made some progress, but we can do more.

CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you very much, gentlemen.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF CONGRESS HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON THE DEMOCRATIC SECURITY AGENDA, 4/25/2006

CLINTON: Go vote.

Well, it's great to be here with our colleagues from the House. And I want to thank Ed Markey for his leadership on these issues, going back literally decades. He and I have worked together on dirty bomb legislation, which has been an obsession for both of us, and it's something that we just keep bringing up because we don't think that we are doing enough to protect against the potential of radiological and nuclear attack.

And I want to thank my friend and colleague Jerry Nadler. He has as good an understanding of what we need to do to protect our transportation infrastructure as anybody in the country.

And I want to congratulate you, Jerry, on once again getting an amendment that sort of sets the bar. And we're all going to try to not only support you in the House, but comparably get the same kind of legislation through in the Senate.

Senator Menendez and I, Senator Schumer, Senator Lautenberg are all focused on making sure that we do get real port security provisions in the supplemental.

CLINTON: It has been frustrating, to say the least, because this has gone on now for four and a half years, where many of us have repeatedly introduced legislation, amendments, to try to get the resources and the focus on port security that we know we need.

The controversy over the Dubai Ports deal at least elevated this issue very high in public consciousness, but now we've got to deliver. It's really unfair to raise the legitimate specter of the dangers that we believe stalk our ports because of our inadequate response and then not do anything about it.

And as has already been said, we know what it takes to do it right. Other countries, other ports around the world are inspecting every container. They are much more focused on the kind of outcomes that we want here at home.

Similarly, we are joining our homeland security, port security agenda with our energy security agenda, because they go hand in hand. We are at greater risk in our country because of our dependence on foreign oil, our stubborn refusal to move toward a program that would lead eventually to more self-sufficiency.

So the Democratic leadership will be pushing energy security at the same time.

The president gave a speech today about gas prices. It was, in my view, too little, too late. We called for an FTC-Department of Justice investigation last summer.

Some of you might remember trekking with us over to a gas station on Capitol Hill to have a Democratic press conference laying out a specific plan about what could be done to bring down gas prices.

Once again, for political reasons, the administration and the Republican majority are hopping on the bandwagon, but they are not going to ride it very far unless they come up with a real legislative agenda that includes investigating these unconscionable price spikes and profits; doing what I have urged, which is to require the oil companies to be part of the solution, not part of the problem, by investing in alternative energy or being required to pay some of their profits into a strategic energy fund; doing what I have recommended of setting up a DARPA-like agency in the Department of Energy that would be adequately funded to do the kind of Manhattan Project research into energy alternative, and put this on a fast track.

CLINTON: So Democrats have ideas about what to be done. We welcome the president, belatedly, to a real debate about what we should try to accomplish. But we need more than a speech, we need more than a line in the State of the Union, we need specific legislative recommendations that the White House will get behind and make sure we get enacted as soon as possible.

So it's my great honor now to throw the ball to Senator Lautenberg...

NATIONAL PRESS CLUB NEWSMAKER BREAKFAST PROGRAM WITH SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY), 5/23/2006

Let's welcome Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton to the National Press Club.

(Applause.)

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you very, very much, Jonathan. I don't have time to rebut everything you've said in your introduction. (Laughter.) But I cannot let stand that I have ever, ever been a Mets fan. (Laughter.) I have to set the record straight. Cubs and Yankees. Those were my teams and remain my teams, growing up and now in my more mature years.

It is wonderful to be back here at the Press Club. And I thank you for the invitation. I am delighted to have a chance to talk about an issue that is not going away. And it is not just about gas prices, because we've been here before. We've seen gas prices go up and the country scurry around trying to decide what to do to wean ourselves from imported oil, to be more self-sufficient, only to have gas prices fall and everybody just forget about what we need to do to protect ourselves going forward.

So we've been hearing a lot about energy policy in the last several months, and I was thinking about my own very first encounter with the problems that we are coping with today. About 35 years ago, I was in law school and I edited a paper for a fellow student who was writing about an obscure organization that I had never heard of, which would soon, he posited, be very important to the world's economy. It was called OPEC or something like that.

And I've never forgot (sic) that because, like most Americans, I had grown up with very cheap gas. My late father used to love gas wars. He would drive for miles. We'd get in the car. We'd spend hours looking for 20-cent gas. And sometimes you'd get to one corner and there'd be this gas war going on, and, you know, the Sinclair station would be at 20 cents, and all of a sudden the Esso station would be at 19 cents. My father lived for that.

So from my perspective, you know, energy had never been a problem. Other than, you know, being told to turn off the lights when you left a room and turning down the thermostat at night, I was like most Americans -- not really tuned in to what it could mean if we let our energy future basically be determined by interests and forces outside of our own country and our own authority.

So while the security and the environmental challenges of our reliance on high-priced mostly imported oil are very real, it is the economic challenge that is most visible to every American -- those higher gas prices, rising inflation, and now higher interest rates. So Americans today are once again feeling the effect of runaway oil prices and the failure of our energy policies.

Now, there are no easy answers to the complexity of this problem, but I believe that we can get our arms around it. It will take a well-funded, comprehensive approach with staying power. Government has to change basically our "do nothing" policies. Businesses have to be part of the solution, not the problem, and provide accessibility, efficiency and innovation. And we, as citizens, have to do much more to reduce our dependence on oil and begin to conserve and demonstrate more energy efficiency. We can't just point fingers and sort of place blame on anyone else. Foreigners over there, oil companies over here -- the ball is in our court. It is up to us to act and to act soon. It is going to require a virtual revolution in our thinking about energy and in the actions that must follow.

Now, energy is at the heart of the three great challenges we face as a nation. How do we keep our economy strong in a more competitive world? How do we keep our communities safe in a more dangerous world? And how do we protect our values in a rapidly changing world?

Our present system of energy is weakening our national security, hurting our pocketbooks, violating our common values, and threatening our children's future. Right now, instead of national security dictating our energy policy, our failed energy policy dictates our national security. We would never leave 10 percent of our military or intelligence assets vulnerable to an easy attack, but that's what we've allowed to happen with oil.

Just one terminal in Saudi Arabia handles about one out of every 12 barrels of the world's oil exports. That's enough to trigger a new crisis beyond the scale of the 1970s, if it were cut off. One terrorist attack has already been foiled there, and other threats have been made.

We would never deliberately put ourselves in a position that allowed Iran to believe that because of its oil reserves it is invulnerable to sanctions for its dangerous nuclear program, or for Sudan to think that China will protect it from the consequences of genocide in Darfur in return for access to oil, or for Russia to use its energy policy to pressure its smaller neighbors. But as world demand for oil pushes prices higher and intensifies the competition for future supplies, those are just some of the consequences of our present energy policy.

Energy, we all know, is essential to our economic security, and the trend lines are terrible. Petroleum imports accounted for nearly one-third of our trade deficit last year. Now, that does hurt everyone, it does have economic consequences in the short, medium and long term. Some industries face immediate threats. Every penny increase in gas prices costs U.S. airlines $180 million. Now imagine what will happen if, as predicted, costs continue to double every five years. High energy costs burden business and diminish our competitiveness, and they're also a strain on families. When energy prices are rising faster than incomes, every family feels the consequences, but our most vulnerable families feel them the worst. Almost one in three low-income families have skipped mental or dental -- medical or dental care, and almost one in four have missed a rent or mortgage payment because of energy expenses.

And finally, our values demand that we be good stewards of the planet for our children and our children's children. We are failing that simple moral test if we continue to stand by as the Earth warms faster than at any time in the past 200,000 years. I have seen firsthand and have heard from the natives in places from Point Barrow, Alaska, to Svalbard, Norway, about the consequences of global warming.

And now, thanks to former Vice President Al Gore, who has been a committed visionary on global warming for more than two decades, everyone can see those consequences for themselves at a local movie theater.

But this is not a time, I would argue, for handwringing or despair, despite the formidable challenges we confront. We can fix these problems together by changing to a clean energy future fueled by innovation and efficiency. And of course the alternative is pretty stark. If we don't change, our problems will only worsen. The Department of Energy forecasts that demand for oil worldwide will rise more than 30 percent by 2025; carbon dioxide emissions from energy use will rise almost 30 percent over the same period.

So our economy and our environment cannot afford the status quo. And we can start not just looking at the problems, debating the problems, but understanding what prevents us from dealing with them, and I think that there are two myths that still block us from action and that boil down to the idea that we as individuals, as communities, as businesses, even as our country, are basically powerless. You know, that kind of fatalism is just wrong. I would also argue it is un-American.

First, too many people are still stuck on the idea that we will struggle for a very long time, hurt our economy and lose jobs if we try to change the way we fuel transportation and provide electricity to our economy. But if we look at the evidence, that myth just does not hold up. In fact, the present crisis offers us a great opportunity to improve the lives of all Americans with more predictable energy prices in a cleaner environment with technology-driven job growth and new economic dynamism. And the sooner we start, the sooner the benefits will kick in.

Denmark now gets 20 percent of its power from wind. Brazil makes enough ethanol to power 40 percent of its cars.

Britain switched to clean energy technologies, has created hundreds of thousands of jobs in the last five years, while GDP has risen. And the UK has hit its Kyoto targets to reduce greenhouse gases ahead of schedule. We are now spending far more on military security in the Persian Gulf than it would cost to jump-start a clean energy future with all the benefits in new jobs, enhanced security and reduced global climate change.

Here at home, energy guru Amory Lovins estimates that taking steps to eliminate our oil dependence will actually save the U.S. economy tens of billions of unproductive dollars per year by 2025, and that doesn't even count the benefits for our security and the environment.

Now, this can't happen overnight, and it does require a major change in policy and attitude, not just in the government but also in the private sector and, indeed, in each of our lives. But we need to resist the idea that kicking the oil habit will wreck our economy. In fact the greater risk is that we will wreck our economy by failing to kick the habit.

Second, we need to discard the myth that conservation can't play a large role in our transformation. The easiest way to reduce our dependence on oil immediately is to use less. Now, for some it's become almost fashionable to make fun of conservation. A few years ago, Vice President Cheney famously mocked conservation as nothing but a, quote, "sign of personal virtue," irrelevant to our national energy needs. Now, the truth is that conservation is not just a personal virtue, but an important part of any sensible energy policy.

We worked our way out of the last big energy crisis in the '70s and early '80s almost entirely through conservation. From 1977 to 1985, our economy grew by 3 percent a year, while oil use dropped 2 percent each year, driven by the increasing efficiency of our vehicles, our appliances, our businesses.

Think about this. If we got back on that pace today, it would take less than three years to reduce oil consumption by an amount equal to what we import from the Persian Gulf.

The opportunities are overwhelming. About 80 percent of the energy potential of oil is wasted in internal combustion engines. More than half the energy potential of coal is wasted in traditional utility plants. Almost all of our homes and commercial buildings could use energy more efficiently.

American business knows something the vice president needs to find out. Conservation is about efficiency, about doing more with less, not doing less with less. Companies like General Electric and Dow Chemical have made major efforts to improve energy efficiency, and they've seen major improvements in their bottom line.

Six months ago, I outlined a set of proposals in a speech to an enthusiastic group of clean energy venture capitalists. It's called the Clean Tech Venture Network. They're actually investing money in this new energy future, and they're being joined every day by more and more smart investors.

Today, I want to suggest a concrete goal of reducing our dependence on foreign oil by at least 50 percent by 2025. That would be a reduction in oil consumption of just under 8 million barrels a day. Now I believe a 50 by 25 initiative will energize our economy, not undermine it. And how will we get there? Two words -- innovation and efficiency. They encompass the three major tasks that I want to discuss today.

First, we need to convert our liquid fuel base from oil to biomass. That can reduce our consumption by 4 million barrels a day by 2025.

Second, we need to change our reliance on high carbon electricity sources to low carbon electricity sources through innovation in renewables, such as solar and wind, as well as carbon dioxide sequestration.

The third task is efficiency; getting much more from the cars, buildings, power plants, manufacturing processes we have. Just by major efficiencies in cars, expanding hybrids, getting more fuel efficiency from trucks, industrial and residential sources, we can reduce consumption by another 4 million barrels a day.

Now, efficiency will start us down the road to a better energy future, but an independent clean energy future will require dramatic innovation. The possibilities are greater than ever for governments, science and industry to succeed. For example, scientists estimate that the wind potential of just three states -- Texas, Kansas and North Dakota -- is equal to more than half of the electricity we consume today. California could meet half of its power needs from solar alone.

Technology is finally bringing down the prices and making these innovations closer to commercial application every day. Wind is the fastest growing power source in our country and worldwide. It's now competitive with coal in areas where the conditions are right. Both solar and wind costs drop by one-third every time capacity doubles, and that's now happening about every two years. Last year, power generated from solar cells increased by 57 percent, and many states are making big bets on alternative energy from solar arrays in Arizona to wind farms in Maine.

In Upstate New York, there is a new wind farm that's gone in on the acreage that has until now been primarily devoted to dairy farmers, and it's got enough wind power to provide electricity to 50,000 homes.

And it also, by the payments that it makes to the farmers, guarantees the farmers can stay on their land.

But we can't just wait for innovation. Just like the Manhattan or Apollo projects, it takes focused and dedicated resources to make it happen. That's why today I'll be introducing legislation for a strategic energy fund. We need a serious commitment from government to prioritize advanced energy, and a commitment from our oil companies to reinvest their unanticipated profits into our shared energy future. I want the oil companies to be part of the solution. Last year, the top six oil companies had combined profits of $113 billion, more than the annual income of 170 countries. Now, Exxon Mobil had, you know, the highest profits in corporate history. Yet, when CEO Lee Raymond was asked about how much his company had invested in alternative energy over the last decade, his reply was, and I quote, "a negligible amount." Well, that's unexcusable. You know, the oil company is making $300 million a day, not because they planned on it, not because of great managerial expertise, but because of escalating world demand and, therefore, increasing prices for their commodity that they didn't create in the first place. I think it's time that we made sure they put a fair share of their profits toward a sound energy future.

Last month I joined with colleagues in writing the president to ask him to support Senator Cantwell's legislation to make price gouging a federal crime in our oil and gasoline market. Now, we still haven't heard back, but I want to reiterate that call today. But we can do better than that, and here's how. We need to reform our energy taxes so that large oil companies who reap huge benefits from unexpectedly high energy prices over the next two years will be required to pay a portion of their profits into the strategic energy fund. Basically, if you take an average of their profits from 2000 to 2004, you add a 10 percent figure on top of that, then you can get to a point where those profits for just two years would be invested in the strategic energy fund.

Now, the oil companies would have the option, they wouldn't have to invest if they did this themselves, if they began making investments in biofuels, in other forms of renewable energy, in new, cleaner refining capacity -- solar, wind. If they did it themselves, then they wouldn't have to pay into the fund. And we ought to repeal the tax breaks that even the oil companies have told us they don't need, and put that money into the fund as well.

With prices, profits and with these tax breaks in the fund, you could raise about $50 billion, more than enough to begin the energy revolution that we need.

Now, some of that money should go to reforming our tax code into an incentive, not a disincentive, to invest in clean fuels and diversify our energy sources.

Right now our tax policies are totally upside down. We give large tax breaks for oil exploration far from our shores and limited tax breaks for installing biofuel pumps at America's gas stations. We give consumers better tax breaks for buying humvees than for purchasing hybrids and using clean energy.

So I support comprehensive legislation that would overhaul our energy taxes; signal the market we're in this for the long run by extending for 10 years the production tax credit; spur demand by doubling consumer tax breaks for hybrids, clean diesel and other advanced vehicles; and create a new tax incentive for fleet owners to purchase more efficient vehicles; speed the development of cellulosic ethanol by providing loan guarantees for the first billion gallons of commercial production capacity; ramp up the availability of ethanol by providing gas station owners with a 50 percent tax credit for the cost of installing ethanol pumps; and then extend and increase tax incentives for homeowners and businesses who will make their homes and businesses more energy-efficient. There's a lot of good information out there about how to do it, but unfortunately not much incentive to do it.

The strategic energy fund would allow government and business to work together to help solve some of the toughest scientific challenges that we have to deal with when it comes to energy and climate. You know, we have the National Institutes of Health that promotes partnerships for innovation. We ought to have something like a National Institute of Energy.

That's why last September I proposed a research agency modeled on DARPA, the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency. And I was delighted that later that fall a National Academy of Science report endorsed the concept.

Now, DARPA was created after Sputnik went up and the entire country just reacted as one. How could this happen? It was a very unwelcome surprise.

Well, it was created with the idea we would bring our best minds together, our universities, our business research labs, as well as government, to try to figure how out to jump-start and get ahead of the Soviet Union when it came to space technology.

Well, it succeeded, with stealth technology and global positioning satellites that empower our military, as well as a few surprises that today we all live with, namely the Internet and even the computer mouse.

Now, we'll never find the equivalent of stealth technology for energy if we don't look for it. Since 1978, federal and private spending on energy-related research and development has fallen more than 60 percent. I propose that over the next five years we devote from the Strategic Energy Fund $9 billion into this Advanced Research Project Agency for Energy. We encourage creative, competitive projects. We think outside the box. We tell young inventors who maybe nobody's ever heard of before that there'll be prizes for inventions that can help us move more quickly on the path to energy independence.

We also need to put the enormous purchasing power of the federal government to work to help create markets for renewable electricity, more efficient vehicles and appliances and biofuels. Federal buildings should be designed -- whenever possible and then retrofitted as well -- to meet the highest green building standards. By 2010, we should require that the federal government purchase the most efficient cars made. That would create an annual market of more than 60,000 vehicles to spur continual improvements in technology. By 2013, we should require that 10 percent of federal electricity purchases come only from renewable sources, and by 2020, we should reduce federal oil consumption by 40 percent. I'm very proud that in New York, the Binghamton Federal Building was the first in the country to purchase 100 percent of its electricity from renewals.

Now, we can do all of this, and there are so many exciting developments -- you know, if I'd been here five years ago or 10 years ago, I couldn't have sit up here and said we can do this because we hadn't made some of the breakthroughs, and it would have been a much more difficult path. Yes, we could have done it, but it would have been much harder than what I believe is possible now.

You know, wind and solar power are terrific examples. Right now, there's a two- to three-month backlog of orders for solar cells, like the kind that are in the Clinton Library in Little Rock. And wind is the fastest-growing source of energy, and one of the largest solar power systems in the country is at the Marine base in Twentynine Palms, California, generating 10 percent of the base's needs. We need a renewable portfolio standard to require 20 percent of electricity produced from wind, solar and other renewables by 2020.

Now, there is so much money to be made from this, and a couple of visionary companies have really gotten out ahead. I want to applaud GE for its extraordinary commitment to a new energy future. GE will sell this year $3 1/2 billion worth of wind turbines, and expect sales to reach $5 billion next year. That supports jobs in four states, including my own. Investing in renewable energy creates more jobs than other energy investments -- 40 percent more than a comparable investment in coal, for example.

Now, companies from Europe and Japan are flooding into energy markets that were pioneered by Americans. I don't want to lose either that technological edge or the jobs and exports that come from that kind of commitment.

Now, we can also make a gallon of gas go a lot further. You all have been reading and hearing a lot about the use of homegrown energy; clean diesel and ethanol made from corn, sugarcane, cellulosic materials. We have an underused resource, American farmland, and rural communities across our country eager to try something new and do their part to help solve our energy problems.

Today, we have 97 biorefineries located in 19 different states with the capacity to make nearly 4.5 billion gallons of ethanol. Now over the next 12 to 18 months, we will increase that capacity by 50 percent, and we're seeing it in New York as we're seeing it around the country. But think about that. We have the capacity to make nearly 4.5 billion gallons of ethanol, but that is a long way from helping us deal with our gas problem. We need to be moving on a much faster track, and last week, I met with the CEOs of the Big Three auto companies. They are enthusiastically ramping up production of FlexFuel vehicles, but there's hardly anywhere in the country to get your vehicle fueled if it's FlexFueled.

So we need to take immediate steps to make sure that the rapid expansion in biofuels continues and that we not only have the vehicles that can run on ethanol, but we have places where you can get them filled. Right now, there are more than 5 million FlexFuel vehicles on the road. Their owners may not even know it. Automakers could start with a good news recall to let owners know what's under their hoods and where to find a biofuel station. We should put a billion dollars from the Strategic Energy Fund into research aimed at unlocking the full potential of cellulosic ethanol. We can expand loan guarantees to help the first 1 billion gallons of cellulosic ethanol capacity come on-line, and I think we've got to action on this pump issue or we're just spinning our wheels, so to speak.

I propose that we have ethanol pumps at 50 percent of gas stations nationwide by 2015 and 100 percent by 2025. Obviously, these are goals; I hope we can go even faster. We should be requiring the big oil companies to install ethanol pumps at all the stations they own. We should also provide a tax incentive to the independence and other owners to do so over the next 10 years and then a mandate to get it done immediately. You know, biofuels is a tremendous opportunity for us, but we need to make sure we seize it, and the only way to do that is to have a supply and a demand chain that actually works for the average driver.

Now, as we talk about innovative clean fuels, I want to just mention clean diesel because we don't use clean diesel as much in our country as they do in Europe, and I think it's another opportunity -- again, a homegrown opportunity. Just two quick examples.

At Corning, a wonderful company I represent in New York, they're making the filters to go onto school buses to clean up the pollution from old diesel. So they're dealing with the environmental impact of diesel. At Cummins Engine Plant in Jamestown, they're building the engines that will run on low-sulfur diesel. And we have to get the low-sulfur diesel rule fully implemented by 2007, which is the deadline. The oil companies already got one delay, and we can't let that happen again because companies like Cummins are investing billions of dollars in making sure that have low-sulfur diesel engines on the road. If the oil companies won't step up to the plate on cleaner fuels, then they need to get out of the way and let innovative companies do that.

We also are making some progress in fuel cells, thanks to companies like Plug Power, General Motors, Delphi, Kodak. But we have to deal with coal because we have huge resources of coal. Coal is to us what oil is to Saudi Arabia, and part of our domestic strategy must involve coal. But unless we learn to burn it cleanly, the price of independence from imported oil by using coal will be accelerated global warming. Even if the United States never burned another lump of coal, China is bringing online a 1,000 megawatt coal-fired power plant every 10 days. So if we're going to reassert our leadership on climate change, which I think we should, we've got to deal with coal. And the first step is to take a mandatory cap and trade system, like that developed in the McCain-Lieberman legislation that I support, but obviously going out and trying to reengage the rest of the world in this issue. But unless we get to clean coal, it's going to be very hard to achieve.

Geological sequestration, storing carbon deep within the Earth after you extract the carbon from the burning coal, holds the key to making coal use compatible with the need to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. Scientists believe we will be able to store nearly all of the carbon dioxide we currently emit for hundreds of years. But we need more real world data, and that can only come from large-scale testing. I propose we do two things to scale up the potential of clean coal.

First, undertake five large-scale test of geological sequestration in a variety of settings to really investigate the viability of this technology.

Second, provide tax credits for carbon sequestration to encourage domestic oil production. Oil companies already inject carbon dioxide into mature fields like the ones we have here in the United States to recover oil. The Department of Energy estimates that with oil price at $40 or higher per barrel, it is economical with ample CO₂ supply to use CO₂ to recover as much as 47 billion barrels of oil from existing U.S. fields. Think of what we could recover at today's prices, as we were cleaning the air at the same time.

Nuclear now is very much in the news as a potential power source because of its lack of contribution to global warming. If you look at nuclear energy, which currently provides 20 percent of our energy with virtually no emission of greenhouse gases, we do have to take a serious look. But there remain very serious questions about nuclear power and our ability to manage it in a world with suicidal terrorists. So I have real concerns, specifically about a plant in my state near where I live, Indian Point, which has had a number of problems, and more generally, with the capacity and quality of the oversight provided by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. So we need to resolve problems with the NRC, as well as questions of cost, safety, proliferation and waste before we go forward with nuclear power.

But we can do all of that on the research, demonstration side while we are getting more efficient at the same time. You know, we can look at all of the options for efficiency, and there are many that we are just basically ignoring. You know, last year in Auburn, New York, Nucor Steel spent ($14/40 ?) million on a continuous reheat furnace, money it will earn back in just three years through efficiency savings and higher productivity. Texas Instruments was going to build its next plant in another country. Through efficiency, it decided to stay and build in Texas.

So I just would make a plea that we do more to set the standards for energy efficiency and let businesses and homes and others know more about what each of us can do, and provide some technical assistance and support. That's especially important with low-income people because we haven't done anywhere near what we should on weatherization of homes -- which, again, helps cut bills for the persons living in the home, but also saves energy for the rest of us.

Let's now talk about transportation, which is the hardest issue of all. First, we do need to do more on mass transit. We need to look at places in our country where mass transit makes sense and make the investment. Some states are doing that. We are missing a tremendous opportunity to save money and save energy because we haven't done enough on mass transit.

But we have to look at how we make more efficiency in transportation. We have to change the engines and fuels in the cars that Americans drive. Hybrids is an example of what we need to do. You know, most foreign oil is used in automobiles, about 70 percent. And the surest way to reduce oil consumption is through hybrid technology, that increases fuel efficiency by 30 to 40 percent. Hybrid sales are doubling every year. Manufacturers, like Ford, are setting ambitious goals for new hybrid production. We have major new improvements in hybrid engines coming on line. There's a really great partnership between General Motors, Daimler-Chrysler and BMW that will build state-of-the-art hybrid engines less than 50 miles from here in Baltimore.

The next step is hybrid plug-ins, enabling drivers to use household electricity to recharge car batteries at night. I saw some of these. They were on display on Capitol Hill. You can drive a hundred miles or more for every gallon of fuel you put in the tank.

I also recommend what's called a feebate. That means, for the least efficient old cars, we need to provide a tax incentive so that people trade them in for more efficient cars.

And finally, I do believe it's vital we make progress on fuel efficiency standards. We can't separate, however, the challenge of making auto manufacturing more energy-efficient and the challenge of making U.S. manufacturing more competitive.

I believe we could do both. We need to be sure that our high standards don't provide an easy excuse for more auto jobs to leave the U.S., but I don't think that's the reason not to do it. We just need to be more creative about it.

We've been in a stalemate on CAFE standards for quite some time. I've worked with Senator Obama on legislation to offer auto companies assistance with retiree health care costs in exchange for them investing more in fuel-efficient cars. That's a start, but we need the carmakers, the unions and the Bush administration to hammer this out. This is one of those moments that cries out for presidential leadership. And President Bush will be meeting with the CEOs of the Big Three automakers on June 2nd, and I think we should challenge all sides to take that opportunity, to come back to Congress with a real proposal that will reform and raise our car fuel efficiency standards and provide Detroit with the help it needs to ensure that the cars are designed and built here in the United States.

I also fully endorsed an idea that Senator Lugar has been promoting. We need a new commitment to a Strategic Petroleum Reserve. Specifically, we should increase it to hold 90 days of supply. We should use mandates and incentives to ensure that distributors hold similar stocks of gasoline, heating oil, jet fuel and other refined products. We should update the process of releasing oil from the reserve to make it transparent and responsive to short-term market swings.

And beyond that, we do need to work with other countries to build up strategic reserves in places like China and India that also can be buffeted by the global economy if they're not prepared, and that can then set off panic in the global marketplace.

This should be the first step of a major effort, as Senator Lugar has proposed, to develop strategic partnerships with those countries to work cooperatively on clean coal, climate change and other energy issues we cannot solve in isolation.

So here we are. There's a lot to be done, and I know that this is probably a more wonkish speech than many of you anticipated. But I feel so strongly about this because I'm afraid what has happened before will happen again. Gas prices go up. Everybody's in a panic. Everybody talks about what we have to do. Gas prices go down. The sense of urgency recedes, and we just keep sort of stumbling forward into an energy future that we are not in control of.

Oil sits at $70 a barrel. Goldman Sachs predicts a hundred dollars a barrel by 2010.

So we have two choices here. We have two paths we can pursue.

You know, we can just let people stew in it, and if they can't afford to get to work, that's their problem. I ran into a woman the other day who said, "You know, Senator Clinton, I don't know what I'm going to do.

You know, my commute, 25 miles each way, is now costing me about a hundred dollars more. I don't know where that money is going to come from."

We can wait for the terrible potential of a terrorist attack to hit a pipeline, to hit a terminal and with all that that will mean to the world economy. We can see global warming slowly, but surely have the incredible effects it's having from -- you know, from flooding and storms to desertification. Or we can make a choice, and this is where I come down.

You know, I remember sitting in my office a few -- about a year and a half ago, and we were debating the McCain-Lieberman bill on the floor, which I have continually supported. And one of my colleagues came to the floor in opposition, and he just basically said: We can't do this. It'll ruin our economy. We'll go backwards. It'll destroy the American standard of living. And I just couldn't believe what was I hearing, and I got up and I went to the floor. And I said, "Since when have Americans become so fatalistic that we go around saying we can't do it, we can't do it? That is not the tradition of our country. We can do it. We just need a commitment to do it, and we need the leadership in both the public and the private sectors to get it done." And I believe that we definitely can get it done.

So from my position today, I hope we make the right choice. Thank you all very much. (Applause.)

MR. SALANT: Sorry for the interruption. Even my 8-year-old knows that when you're invited guests, you're supposed to be polite and listen to the speaker and give the courtesy that you would like.

We have two energy questions for you. What are five specific actions that every American and every business should take now or in the next few years to return -- to reduce energy use? And what do you personally plan to do?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, there are a lot of actions we can take.

I mean, one is switch to fluorescent lighting, I mean even if it's not all the lighting in your house. There's now some new higher-energy florescent lighting. It saves an enormous amount of electricity. Buy appliances that come with the sort of Energy Star or other designations that they are low energy users. Look for ways to weatherize your own home, to look at, you know, windows and leaks. I mean, this sounds so simplistic, but the net aggregate effect can be extraordinarily high in terms of saving money for the individual and also for the entire system.

We all need to get into more fuel-efficient cars, which is something that, you know, Bill and I are focused on trying to do right now because, clearly, we've got to show more market power in order to support the car companies. And I am a passionate believer that we've got to enable our three automakers to survive. Some people are flippant about that. It's one in every 10 jobs in America; in some parts of the country it is a concentrated number of jobs and economic development.

When it comes to businesses, the same sort of efficiency, energy audit has to be done. There are people available to help do this. You know, I mentioned briefly the Texas Instruments example. They were about to move off shore for a new plant. They contacted someone Bill and I have known for many years and worked with actually back in Arkansas in energy efficiency uses -- Amory Levins at the Rocky Mountain Institute. You can go to the Rocky Mountain Institute website and there's literally a -- probably a million different ideas about what people can do. But to Texas Instruments' credit, working with Amory Levins, they were able to build a plant in Texas that is very energy efficient, which saved them enough money that the other advantages cost-wise that they might have realized by moving were a wash.

And finally, you know, when Bill built his library, he was determined that it would be energy efficient. And it was a bit of a challenge because there still are a lot of people who don't know what that means or how to do it. But he was lucky because he had an architect and he had contractors and builders, engineers who were really gung ho to do this.

But I think we need a more concerted effort to reach out and work with people who build our buildings, who renovate them, to help us become more energy efficient.

And there are a lot of other ideas, but those are just a few that people can do in their homes and in their businesses.

MR. SALANT: Regarding fuel economy standards, do you favor making SUVs follow the same CAFE standards as passenger cars?

And do you support Congressman Boehlert's bill to raise the CAFE standards to 33 miles per gallon for all vehicles?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I have the greatest respect for Congressman Boehlert. We're going to miss him when he retires at the end of this year. He has studied this issue, and he comes down sort of in the middle of where a lot of people are. Some want to go to a higher MPG; others not so ambitious.

I think we can stage this in a way that is not disruptive to the economy, and by giving the right incentives and support to the car companies, manage this over the next 10 to 15 years.

Now, we have to get the old, inefficient cars off the road, which is I proposed a feebate, get them to be able, with a tax incentive, buy a fuel-efficient car. And, you know, the president has asked for the same authority for passenger cars that he used for light trucks, but he just didn't go far enough. You know, I think the increase, as I recall, is, like, 1.8 miles per gallon. We can do better than that, recognizing the fact that we have to help the car companies be able to manage this.

That's why I really hope that when the president meets on June 2nd, that there could be some real proposals put on the table. Because I'm not going to predict exactly what we should do. I just know we've got to set some goals, and we need to reach them because back in, you know, '77 to '85, that is how we worked our way out of the first oil shock that OPEC, you know, produced for us -- buy more efficiency, more conservation and raising gas mileage.

MR. SALANT: During the Carter administration, there was a 55 mile-an-hour speed limit, to which even oil company executives say driving slow would save gas. Would you favor a return to a national speed limit?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, there are just some parts of the country where that's just not going to happen, you know, where you've got miles of open, flat road. I would like to call on people to try to exercise as much responsibility as they can, given the temptation and the necessity of those long roads and what it does to you.

But I think there's a different way of looking at this. The 55 mile speed limit really does lower gas usage, and wherever it can be required and that people will accept it, we ought to do it.

But there are other things that we ought to do. At every gas station there ought to be a little sign which says, "Have you checked to see if your tires are inflated to the right pressure?" If you do that, you also save gas mileage. I mean, there are things that can be done. So maybe the trade-off is, you know, in most of the country, where 55-miles an hour doesn't seem like a burden, we have that; in the rest of the country, inflate your tires before you head off into the sunset. (Laughter.)

MR. SALANT: We have a lot of questions -- changing the subject -- we have a lot of questions about the Iraq war. Do you regret your vote for the war, in view of the deaths and destruction and the falsehoods told in the run-up?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I have said on numerous occasions that I regret the way the president used the authority he was given. And I think it's clear that the mistakes and misjudgments that have followed the policy in Iraq have taken a very heavy toll on our country -- in the lives lost, the injuries suffered, the billions of dollars spent, and certainly the death and destruction and the impact on Iraq.

I've also said that we have to wait until an Iraqi government is in place. That is now happening. I didn't think you could negotiate with an interim government, which is like negotiating with ourselves, because there wasn't yet an elected government that in the eyes of the world had the legitimacy to take responsibility for the security of the Iraqi people and work with us and our other allies. We are moving in that direction. We still have a long ways to go. We don't have, you know, a minister of Interior or Defense, unless one has been named while we've been here.

But I think once there is a fully established Iraqi government, we have to make it very clear that the Iraqis are responsible for their own security, the Iraqis are responsible for ending the sectarian violence, the Iraqis are responsible for making sure that the electricity is on. And we have to make that very, very clear. And I've said that on many different occasions.

So we're getting to a point where we will be able to deal with an Iraqi government, and I think at that point we have to make it absolutely clear to them that the United States has sacrificed a great deal for this moment, for the Iraqis to have a government of their own choosing, elected in a free election, that must recognize the differences among the people of Iraq and work to create a unified Iraq.

And once we get to that point, then I think you can make other decisions. But I don't think we're there quite yet, but we should be there soon.

MR. SALANT: You're not going to get out of here without a political question. You're here to talk about energy, but most people are here because they think you will run for president. (Laughter.)

SEN. CLINTON: Really.

MR. SALANT: Do you feel blessed or cursed to get such frenzied attention so early? And do you think it helps or hurts your odds if you decide to run in 2008?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, I don't think about that much because I have no control over that at all. I'm running for reelection, and I'm working very hard on that. And I think it's important to talk about these issues, and I welcome, you know, the contributions of a lot of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle on energy and on other issues. And I am working to try to create some space for bipartisan, sensible, practical solutions to take root, and we desperately need that on energy as well as health care and the environment and a number of other issues. And that's what I'm going to keep focused on, and you know, we'll just have to let the future be the future, whatever that might turn out to be.

MR. SALANT: Before I ask a final question, I'd like to give you the National Press Club coffee mug.

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs, laughter.)

MR. SALANT: Perfect for when you travel to Greece and Rome and Denmark and Copenhagen and Cuba -- all towns in Upstate New York.

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs, laughter.) That's very true.

MR. SALANT: And also the certificate of appreciation for appearing here today. Thank you very much.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you, Jonathan. Thank you very much. Thank you. (Applause.)

MR. SALANT: For a final question, if your career ended now, what would you like most to be remembered for?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I don't want it to end now. (Laughter.) So I'm not even going to think about that. (Laughs, applause.)

Thank you.

MR. SALANT: I'd like to thank everyone for coming today. I'd also like to thank National Press Club staff members: Melinda Cooke, Pat Nelson, Jo Anne Booze and Howard Rothman for organizing today's event. And thanks to the Eric Friedheim Library at the National Press Club for its research.

We're adjourned. (Sounds gavel.)

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY) DELIVERS ACCEPTANCE SPEECH AT DEMOCRAT STATE CONVENTION, 5/31/2006

LOCATION: BUFFALO, NEW YORK

CLINTON: Thank you.

Delegates, I'm honored to be here and deeply, deeply (inaudible). And I accept your nomination to the United States (inaudible).

(APPLAUSE)

You know, as I was standing backstage and watching the film, so many memories came flooding back. (inaudible) 24 hours long, because so many of you (inaudible) endless others across our state have been so kind (inaudible). You've been constructive critics, you've (inaudible) you have stood with me over the last years. (inaudible) has been the privilege of a lifetime to stand up for you.

There are...

(APPLAUSE)

There are so many people to thank that I could stand here until all of you got tired and left and still would not have thanked everyone who (inaudible) moment possible. But I want to start (inaudible).

(AUDIO GAP)

CLINTON: ... single day she worked her heart out for New York.

CLINTON: I know her family is here, and they're among the finest people I've ever known. And Buffalo is lucky to claim them. And we are so fortunate to know that Licia's (ph) future is indeed bright.

So let me thank Licia (ph) and Christine.

(APPLAUSE)

I want to thank Len Lenihan and the entire Erie County Democratic Committee for hosting us and doing such a great job.

Len, you're doing a first-rate job as Democratic chair here.

(APPLAUSE)

And I want to thank and acknowledge the new mayor of Buffalo, Byron Brown, who is bringing young and vigorous leadership to Buffalo. And we have a great team in place now.

I want to thank our state chair, Denny Farrell, and the state committee, so many of whom have worked tirelessly to make this convention successful.

(APPLAUSE)

I know that Speaker Silver is here. I want to thank him for his support, kindness and friendship.

I want to thank Denise King as well for all she's done over the last many years on my behalf.

(APPLAUSE)

Jerry Harper (ph) runs a great convention, with all of the legal rules being kept in mind.

And I particularly want to congratulate our party's designees: Eliot Spitzer, David Paterson, Alan Hevisi, Andrew Cuomo.

(APPLAUSE)

And I want to thank everyone who has competed, everyone running for office. We have a great crop of Democrats throughout New York. And we're going to harvest a big victory in November, led at the top of the ticket by Eliot Spitzer, who is going to come to Albany with the kind of energy that he brought to the attorney general's race. And serving for eight years as our attorney general, demonstrating clearly that the job could be done, confidence could be restored in our marketplace, work could happen that would protect consumers, groundbreaking litigation could be filed that would preserve our environment.

CLINTON: Eliot has been a leader as our attorney general. He will remain a national leader as our governor.

(APPLAUSE)

I want to also thank my husband who's here today. And...

(APPLAUSE)

... he remains an inspiration and a mentor, a friend and a partner, someone who has continued his public service after the presidency through his foundation work here at home and around the world, and is making a difference, as he always has, in the lives of literally millions and millions of people.

(APPLAUSE)

So I thank all of you for your support.

CLINTON: And the film gave us just a snapshot of the work we have done together. There are so many memories of the campaign we waged of the last five and a half years in the Senate.

Seeing the footage of Senator Moynihan reminded me of what a rare public servant he was and how much we miss him today.

But I was also struck, as I looked at the images in the film, that I've had the same hairdo...

(LAUGHTER)

... for the longest period of my life.

(LAUGHTER)

That has to be a record.

(LAUGHTER)

Thank you.

(LAUGHTER)

It takes me awhile, but I finally got it right.

And it also was a great opportunity for me to think about all the causes that we have stood for, all the fights we have waged.

You know, it's been an honor and a joy to work and fight for the values that have shaped my passion for public service for more than 30 years.

I believe in the chance for every person to pursue his or her dreams, to build strong families and raise educated, healthy children who can live out their own dreams.

I believe in the dignity of work that is fairly compensated.

I believe in individual responsibility, but also in strong communities.

I believe that we are safer and stronger when we work together, when we relish our diversity, and when we remember that our great nation is free because of our values, what we have stood for, and that it is the obligation of every American generation to fulfill and advance those values at home and around the world.

I believe that we are blessed in America because, as has been noted from nearly the beginning of the great American experience, we've always had a strong, dynamic economy that rewarded people who worked hard and entrepreneurs and innovators, those who brought good ideas to the marketplace.

And we've always had, even more importantly, the space for us to pursue our personal faith, to support the causes we believed in, to live within that civic space between the market economy and the government where most of life takes place.

And I believe that our government has served us well over the course of American history, because the role of government is to help empower individuals, families and communities to realize the core American values of opportunity and freedom, of responsibility and service.

And this government of ours has, through all kinds of changes, found ways to help provide the tools and the conditions that enable Americans after Americans after Americans to succeed, sometimes against tremendous odds.

And we've also had a government willing and able to stand up against the forces that threaten our dreams and our children's future, to help us invest in what will make us stronger and safer and richer and smarter.

CLINTON: I have been honored, as you have, to be part of the greatest country in the history of the world. I have been blessed, not by anything I did, but because I can call myself an American citizen.

And at very important points...

(APPLAUSE)

... in our country's history we have come together to face the future.

I worry today we are not doing that. In previous times, we've had leadership in both the public and the private sector, from both sides of the aisle, who have led us into a new and sometimes threatening future.

We've had leaders who understood that we had to make investments today in order to realize the benefits tomorrow; that we had to sacrifice today in order to secure our future.

That's not happening in America today. And we all need to stand up and demand new leadership that will once again put our country back on the right track.

(APPLAUSE)

I believe that we need a fundamentally new direction, and we need to work toward solutions that help us meet our 21st-century challenges of expanding our economy, defending our security and preserving our values.

CLINTON: Now, we've been through a lot together these past years. We stood together, united, in the aftermath of September 11th. We've stood together to face the challenges of a more competitive, globalized economy. And yet we have a lot of work still ahead.

At a time when many families are struggling and the economy is still hurting in many parts of our state, we've rowed against the tide and we've made progress.

But I won't stand here and gloss over our challenges because I believe in a government that makes decisions based on facts. And sadly, that seems to be an unusual idea in Washington these days.

(APPLAUSE)

Senator Moynihan said a lot of famous things, but one of my favorites is "Everyone's entitled to his own opinion, but no one is entitled to his own facts."

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

And what we have in Washington is a Republican administration and a Republican Congress that deny and dismiss inconvenient facts, that refuse to engage in the give-and-take of political compromise to try to find consensus and reach toward solutions that will work.

Because we have a lot of work ahead of us. There is work to do to keep and create good paying jobs, to ensure that we have an adequate supply of affordable housing, that the standard of living and the quality of life from Long Island to Buffalo remains achievable for all New Yorkers.

We have work to do to invest in health care and education, transportation and alternative energy, to ensure that our children have opportunities right here in our state.

We've built a good foundation together, but now we have to stand and fight for the future we deserve.

And I pledge to you that I will continue to stand up for you. And so I am asking you once again to stand with me, stand with me as I fight for an energy plan that puts us on the road to energy independence...

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: ... that creates new jobs in clean energy.

Right here in New York, we have some of the cutting-edge companies, we have some of the world-class colleges and universities that are pursuing alternatives to our dependence on imported oil and fossil fuels.

Right here in Albany, we have fuel cells. In Syracuse, we have work being done on biomass. In Rochester, we have an entire effort devoted to trying to take the old economy and use the assets there to enhance our potential for becoming a center for alternative energy.

And here in western New York, we have Cummins Engine in Jamestown building low-sulfur diesel engines, we have Corning creating filters for diesel emissions, and here in Erie County, in Niagara, we have people who are inventing and innovating in the area of new energy, from new plants in Shelby to G.M. Powertrain and so much more.

But we cannot do this without federal policy. We need federal policy that creates a framework so we can make investments in alternative energy and, at the same time, combat the dangers of global climate change.

With record-breaking profits...

(APPLAUSE)

When so many New Yorkers tell me that they don't know how they're going to pay for their commute to work with gas prices going up like they are, I think it's time for the oil companies to put a share of their profits toward alternative energy research and investment.

(APPLAUSE)

That's why I've proposed a strategic energy fund. Oil companies can either invest their profits in alternative energy, or they will be required for two years to invest in the fund.

This will help us create alternatives, to lower costs for energy, reduce our demand for foreign oil, find ways to accelerate the process of using cellulosic and biomass and biodiesel and ethanol of all kinds, really make the investments in wind and solar that have so much potential.

CLINTON: We could in America become a net exporter of new energy technology and employ thousands and thousands of Americans in good, high-paying jobs.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, it's an old saying, but when it comes to energy it is true: You're either part of the solution or you're part of the problem. And it's time for the oil companies to be part of the solution for the sake of our country's future.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand with me to protect New York's environment, from the beautiful beaches and coastline of Long Island, to the lakes of the Adirondacks, to the Great Lakes.

New York is blessed. We have the most beautiful scenery. We are so fortunate because we are overwhelmed with water resources. We are well-positioned for a future that unfortunately looks as though it will have scarcity of resources and have environmental degradation if we don't begin to turn this around.

But it doesn't happen on its own. We need not only state policies, but federal policies. We can do very little about the pollution that comes from utilities in other states that falls into our lakes and rivers unless we have federal support that will clean up and preserve and protect our environment here in New York.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand with me as I continue to fight for affordable quality health care. We've got to cut the administrative costs which take so much money out of our health care dollar.

Does this make sense to you, that we would spend so much more on health care than any other country in the world, that about a third of what we spend would go to administrative costs, that we would spend far more than the next highest spending country by more than 50 percent, and that we would not have all of our people insured and that by every international indicator we don't even have the highest quality of health care in America?

Now, if this makes sense to you, then this system is the one you want.

CLINTON: But if it doesn't make sense to you, then work with me and stand with me so we can finally have a health care system that provides quality, affordable, accessible health care to every single American.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand with me as I fight to revitalize American manufacturing and create good, new, high-paying jobs. Because I believe a country that doesn't make anything is a country that cannot sustain its economic position globally.

Stand with me as I fight to enforce trade rules against countries that don't play by the rules and send a message they've got to stop manipulating their currency, they've got to stop stealing our intellectual property, they have to become good global citizens if they expect to be able to trade with us, just as we have traded with them over all these years.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand with me as I fight for the enforcement of fair labor laws and to protect worker safety to make sure that what happened at ground zero, which has led to so many of those brave first responders, volunteers, workers and residents (inaudible) of getting sick, doesn't happen to anyone else, because we need to have a strong government enforcement of workplace safety, of occupational safety and health rules.

And stand with me as I fight to raise the minimum wage, which hasn't been raised for nearly a decade.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, I've just introduced a bill to tie the minimum wage to congressional salaries.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: I say that if members of Congress get a pay raise, then so should minimum wage earners. They deserve it, and they haven't had one in way, way too long.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand with me as I continue the fight with so many of you to require that our schools provide a first-class education to all of our students. Stand with me to provide preschool education, so that students can start school ready to learn.

Stand with me so that we make college affordable. And stand against the reckless cuts that have come from this administration and Congress (inaudible) to higher education. (inaudible) students who are eligible to go to college, but cannot afford to go and finish.

We need the most highly educated (inaudible) to compete globally. We should not be turning our backs on (inaudible) part of that future.

Stand with me to restore FEMA to its position of respect and results, so that no community in America ever has to go through what our fellow citizens along the Gulf Coast have suffered. It was a disgrace.

There is no explanation for it other than that this administration destroyed FEMA as it was operating during the Clinton administration, stuffed it with cronies and turned their backs and basically left people to fend for themselves.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand with me to implement the 9/11 Commission's recommendations to keep our country safe. You know, these are recommendations that are important to the entire country, but they're especially important for us in New York.

We should have threat-based funding, and New York should get its fair share so that we can protect ourselves. From New York City to Lackawanna, we need to have the resources that our first responders, our mayors, our county executives deserve.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand with me against the wrong-headed, short-sighted foreign policies of this administration. Let's start building alliances instead of alienation around the world. Let's win back the respect that the people of the world should have for our country.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand with our troops, who've been doing the difficult and dangerous job of standing up for us. And remember those who have sacrificed everything for our country.

CLINTON: They deserve our deepest respect and gratitude.

But remember, it's not enough just to put a sticker on the back of our car saying, "Support our troops." Let's make sure they have the body armor and the armored vehicles and the other equipment and materials and training that they deserve to have if they're sent into harm's way.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand with me as we push the Bush administration to take responsibility for the mistakes and misjudgements that they have made around the world.

And stand with me as we put pressure on both the administration and the new Iraqi government to get behind a real plan for the Iraqis to assume a growing responsibility for their own security and safety so that we can begin to bring our troops home.

(APPLAUSE)

So I am asking you to stand with me as I fight for our values, New York's values, America's values, and to fight for decisions made on evidence, not ideology, facts, not politics. Let's fight for real solutions.

You know, I've said it repeatedly: The current administration and the Republican majority are trying to turn Washington into an evidence-free zone.

(LAUGHTER)

If they don't think it is part of their agenda, they want it to go away. They want to turn their backs against reality. They don't want to hear the real-life concerns of people.

It's an environment where it's more important to say "Mission accomplished," than actually accomplish the missions.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand with me against the divide between rhetoric and reality: when we hear that we need to break our addiction to foreign oil but the oil companies continue to receive special tax breaks; when we hear we need to be fiscally responsible but the debt limit has now been raised to $9 trillion.

CLINTON: Stand with me against those who still believe in voodoo economics and instead stand for cutting our deficit, getting back on the path of fiscal responsibility where we were just five years ago because of the policies of a Democratic administration and a Democratic Congress.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand against the effort to muzzle leading scientists who speak out on everything from the dangers of mercury in the air to global climate change.

Stand against the politicization of science, when the FDA tries to prevent us moving forward because to approve certain kinds of prescriptions would inflame the base of the Republican Party. Stand against that and stand up for free and independent thinking and for science and for evidence.

(APPLAUSE)

Stand up for what we know to be true about the kind of country we are.

(APPLAUSE)

We are better than what is happening in America today. Katrina showed in the starkest terms what happens (ph) when you're not making decisions based on the facts on the ground, when they just think they can get away (inaudible) saying, "You're doing a heck of a job."

Well, the facts are we need better than that. We need (inaudible).

(APPLAUSE)

And I believe we're going to be seeing that happen this November. We're going to be electing Democrats across New York and across America because Americans know we have to change direction.

(APPLAUSE)

And so I (inaudible) placing your faith in me. I know you took a chance on me back in (inaudible). And I have worked every day to earn your trust (inaudible).

It has been an extraordinary experience.

CLINTON: I wish I could take every single one of you with me as I travel our beautiful (inaudible), as I go in and out of people's homes and workplaces, as I stand on street corners or in farm fields, and just listen with me to the (inaudible) aspirations of New Yorkers.

We are a resilient people. We care deeply about the future. And each of us is doing the best we can to (inaudible) future as good as it can be, but we are inextricably bound together.

You know, when you think about the leaders of our past who made decisions, it was based on what was best for America; what was best for the future generation; how do we keep this huge, sprawling, diverse country together and all moving into the future with optimism and hope.

That's the real American character. And that's what I believe we will begin to see assert itself this November.

If we stand together as Democrats, if we stand unafraid to criticize but also to propose positive solutions, if we reach out and bring more people in who may not have always agreed with us but who fundamentally believe as we do that we can do better, then I am confident, with hard work, we will take our country back.

I will be there fighting every step of the way. I need you by my side. And when the election comes around this November, after all the hard work, we will once again know that the American journey can continue.

We can achieve great things together. We can stand up for the Empire State. We can reclaim our country. We can assume our standing in the world. And we can send a message far and wide: America is back.

Thank you and God bless you.

(APPLAUSE)

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY) DELIVERS REMARKS AT CAMPAIGN FOR AMERICA'S FUTURE'S TAKE BACK AMERICA 2006 CONFERENCE, 6/13/2006

SPEAKER: U.S. SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY)

CLINTON: Thank you. Good morning.

(APPLAUSE)

This is an enthusiastic, energized group. And we need that energy and enthusiasm as we go into these November elections, because we have to take back the Congress in order to stop this administration and their unaccountable undermining of our constitutional democracy.

(APPLAUSE)

I want to thank my long-time friend, Hilary Shelton, for that introduction. It is nice having somebody else named Hilary. He gets a lot of press, as well.

(LAUGHTER)

He and I have worked together on so many issues, particularly with respect to the Voting Rights Act and the overwhelming need to return integrity to our voting system.

(APPLAUSE)

And I believe so strongly that if we do not go to the local and state level in the next several months to see what local election commissioners are doing, to see what secretaries of state in the ilk of Katherine Harris and Blackwell in Ohio are doing, that we may not have the victories that we deserve and that I think the American people want us to have in November.

So my first and perhaps most important request to all of you is we're not going to get my legislation, Count Every Vote, through the United States Congress. The Republicans have absolutely no interest in changing the way we vote and holding the machine makers responsible, and having a verified paper trail, and eliminating conflicts of interest so that people who run partisan campaigns can't also run the independent verification of election campaigns for states and local communities.

(APPLAUSE)

So until we get back a Democratic Congress, we have to hold local and state officials accountable.

CLINTON: So please, join with me and make sure you do everything you can in the next several months so we don't have a repeat of what happened in Ohio, what happened in Florida.

There are so many issues at stake. And in order to take back America, we have to take back our electoral system. Because we meet at a time when the stakes could not be higher. We all are here in part because we are fed up with what has been going on for the last five and a half years.

Now, we've had a few small victories along the way. You know, last week we stopped the Congress from mangling the Constitution by enshrining discrimination.

(APPLAUSE)

And we stopped them from eliminating the estate tax and adding $1 trillion of debt to our children and our nation.

(APPLAUSE)

We stood together. But it is hard when you're in the minority, which is why we've got to elect more Democrats in November. Because right now, that is the only way that we can prevent them from continuing on the agenda that they are so determined to pursue.

You know, it takes daily skirmishes from those of us in the Congress to try to hold the line on everything from college loans to health care for children, even health care for our veterans.

These particular battles should be viewed in a larger context, because they do represent the stark, philosophical differences between our progressive Democrats and, increasingly, even some moderate independents and a few Republicans who have found their way back to sanity...

(APPLAUSE)

I think we have a few of those in the audience today -- and the right-wing Washington Republicans who are determined to set this country on a disastrous path.

You know, Democrats believe in equal opportunity, in shared responsibilities, in a more inclusive community. They believe in concentrating maximum wealth and power in the hands of the people they consider entitled to rule the rest of us.

We believe in a government that empowers people to live their own dreams, but a government that is also accountable to the people.

They believe -- they truly believe in a government that is run for the benefit of their partisan and commercial allies, and without accountability.

We believe in forming policies based on evidence and argument. They believe ideology determines policy and that evidence is a weak substitute for attack.

CLINTON: We believe in fighting terror and other threats to our security by cooperating with others whenever we can and acting alone only when we are forced to.

They believe in just the reverse: in acting alone whenever they can and cooperating only when there is no alternative.

So for five and a half years...

(APPLAUSE)

... they have controlled the White House and the Congress, and they have succeeded in concentrating wealth and power and resisting accountability and ignoring evidence and going it alone in the world.

And what a price Americans have paid in exploding debt, stagnant wages, rising poverty, more people without health insurance, a more polluted environment, weaker workplace protections, an anemic response to the threat of global warming, exploding oil prices, increasing crime rates, a deeply divided citizenry, and more hostility and alienation from much of the rest of the world.

CLINTON: Now, I have been honored to fight for our values against the right wing's determination to take America away from our founders' vision of a more perfect union for many years.

And I'm grateful for the successes we've had, including the great success we had in stopping their frontal assault on Social Security...

(APPLAUSE)

... and undermining the legitimate right to protection that every generation should have in old age and widowhood and orphanhood and disability.

But I am tired of defining success by what we prevent. It is time for us to start defining success by what we can build and what actions we can take based on that foundation.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, when this administration came to power, it became abundantly clear that they wanted to turn the clock back on the Clinton administration. And I admit, I took that kind of personally...

(LAUGHTER)

... because I thought we'd done a lot of good things for our country and the world in those eight years.

(APPLAUSE)

But, you know, what became clear to me is that it wasn't just the eight years of the Clinton administration, they wanted to turn the clock back on the progress of the 20th century.

(APPLAUSE)

That starting with Teddy Roosevelt, all the way through Bill Clinton, this crowd had been unhappy. They'd been unhappy with saving capitalism, which is what Franklin Roosevelt had done. They had been unhappy with the bipartisan consensus about how we should act in the world to promote America's interests. They had been unhappy with the extension of civil rights and civil liberties.

So they came to town to reinstitute a 19th-century attitude that was basically: "We know best, you don't know anything at all, and we're not going to explain it to you."

CLINTON: And so we've been living with that systematic destruction of everything that happened in the 20th century. I don't care whether it was consumer protection or actually a FEMA that worked and protected people and saved lives and property.

(APPLAUSE)

It was an assault on the environment that had been pent up inside of them for decades, despite the fact that the environment originally was not only a bipartisan issue but the modern environmental movement was led by Republicans. But not for this crowd.

They had a determined effort to suppress science that didn't suit their ideology, to weaken key provisions that protected our air, our land and our water.

They had a clear idea, with their misnamed Clear Skies Initiative, that they were going to turn over control of the air we breathe to the dirtiest polluters in America.

Now, we've stopped that in the courts temporarily. But we have absolute evidence that their support of pollution is not only undermining people's lives; it is leading to premature deaths.

After 9/11, I said repeatedly, "This White House, this EPA is not telling us the truth. It is not safe to breathe the air at ground zero in Lower Manhattan."

(APPLAUSE)

And we fought them and we tried to stop them. And they ignored us and they ignored scientific evidence.

CLINTON: And now I have firefighters and police officers and other people who came down to work and to help who are suffering from all of the diseases that they have incurred because they were not protected by their government.

And that is the kind of attitude that we have to stand against and end, starting this November.

(APPLAUSE)

Well, what do we need to do? Well, first of all, we need a change in direction to make our economy work for everybody, an economy that honors hard work, responsibility and opportunity.

Second, we need dramatic change in direction in our foreign policy, in our national security policy, to protect our country, to begin to unwind the situation in Iraq as soon as we can, and to make it clear to the rest of the world that America's values are what we stand on.

It is not only security we seek, it is to build a safer, more prosperous world that will be better for our children and our children's children. We need a change in direction if we're going to have the values that we care about.

I believe in a very simple principle: that the engine of our economy is a strong middle class, that America is better than the government we currently have, that we can come together once again as a nation.

(APPLAUSE)

We can start by standing up for an economy that honors work again. It is unacceptable that people working for a minimum wage have not had a raise in 10 years.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, my husband and I are often bewildered by the fact that it appears that the Republican majority and the president just can't do enough for us. Every time we turn around, we're getting another tax cut.

(LAUGHTER)

And we keep looking at each other and saying, "Wouldn't it be nice if people who worked hard and played by the rules got tax cuts? Wouldn't it be nice if they were given a chance to get beyond the stagnating wages?"

CLINTON: Productivity's up. Profits are up. But people's wages are not up.

I have introduced legislation that would tie the minimum wage to congressional salaries.

(APPLAUSE)

No more increases for Congress until we raise the minimum wage.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, we also know that education is still a key to our future, individually, as a society.

And during the 1990s, Democrats gave students the largest increase in college aid in 50 years. I was very proud of that because I meet people all the time who had to drop out of college or could never start because they and their families didn't have enough money.

So we were making progress and, sort of, narrowing the gap between high tuition and costs and what the average student and his or her family could pay.

Well, this Congress just passed and the president signed the largest cuts to student loans in our nation's history.

We ought to be doing more, not less, for our students. We ought to be making sure every qualified student can go to college and pursue his or her dreams.

(APPLAUSE)

And, you know, there's a very easy way to do that. All we have to do is cut all the tax breaks for oil companies, pharmaceutical companies and billionaires, and put it into student aid.

(APPLAUSE)

I also believe in a fair shot in life. I've lived long enough to know that things happen.

(LAUGHTER)

And things you never expect.

(LAUGHTER)

Well, we ought to reverse the mean-spirited bankruptcy bill that makes it harder for people to get back on their feet and get a fresh start.

(APPLAUSE)

And we ought to stand up for the right to organize workers and the right for decent health care.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, this is how they think, though. Just imagine this. After Katrina, after the president finally looked at the video that his staff asked him to look at...

(APPLAUSE)

... and saw that there was a major national disaster along our Gulf Coast, what was their first decision?

Well, their first decision was to suspend the rules that made sure workers would get prevailing wages. That's how they think.

CLINTON: Well, we successfully reversed that. But they still haven't cleaned up the Gulf Coast.

I don't know how many of you have been down there. It is a national disgrace. It is heartbreaking. And it didn't have to happen. But the combination of incompetence and insensitivity have left so many people still all on their own.

You know, when the president talks about an ownership society, that's what he really means: "You're on your own."

(LAUGHTER)

"And the rest of us; we're not going to be there for you."

(APPLAUSE)

It is also time for us to restore the basic bargain in America and to expand it.

You know, I was raised to believe that if you worked hard, you did what you were supposed to, you would have opportunities to fulfill the American dream.

It's gotten a little more complicated because of global competition. And we have to be smarter about how we do it. But one thing that is clear to me is we still have not recognized how hard it is for people to work for a living and fulfill their family responsibilities.

(APPLAUSE)

It is as hard in this country as it is anywhere in the world. And yet here we are, the richest of all nations. Why it is so hard for moms and dads to be able to have flex time, to be able to have time off to go to a student-teacher conference or a school play or an athletic event?

(APPLAUSE)

Why is it still absolutely the case that working women don't get equal pay when so many of them are supporting their families and contributing income that's necessary?

(APPLAUSE)

I really appreciate the work that Joan Blades is doing, the co-founder of Move On...

(APPLAUSE)

... along with her colleagues on the Moms Rising agenda.

CLINTON: She'll be addressing this conference. And please pay as close attention, because there is an incredible opportunity here for us to make our society stronger by helping working families fulfill the most important obligation they have, which is to care for the next generation and, increasingly, to care for our parents and our grandparents.

We are in the sandwich generation, many of us, where we have family responsibilities on both ends of the age spectrum.

We need to expand the Family and Medical Leave Act. It doesn't cover enough people.

(APPLAUSE)

We need paid parental leave so that people can afford to have time off. We need to ensure that every single child in America has health care.

And these are the kinds of issues that Moms Rising is promoting.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, much of what we need to do cannot be done unless we return to fiscal responsibility. You know, people say, "Well, is fiscal responsibility a progressive issue?"

Well, as Hilary Shelton said, if the strategy on the other side is the bankrupt the government so that it can't do anything like enforce election laws, like have a functioning FEMA, you know, like take care of people's most basic needs, they're doing a good job of it.

And their ideologues believe that.

You know, one of them famously said they wanted to shrink government so that it was small enough it could be strangled in the bath tub.

Fiscal responsibility gives us an opportunity to promote a progressive agenda. What do you think we were doing in the 1990s?

(APPLAUSE)

We were building the capital needed to make the hard decisions. And they knew it.

So at the end of the Clinton administration, when we had a balanced budget and a surplus, that was not just to put a checkmark in history against the Clinton administration and say, "Oh, look what they did," that was to equip us to do what needed to be done in reforming Social Security the right way, reforming Medicare and Medicaid the right way, making investments in clean, alternative energy, dealing with global climate change, making health care available and affordable to every single American.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: That's what that was for.

(APPLAUSE)

And sometimes I think our opponents understand us better than we do ourselves. Because we have to put fiscal responsibility back at the core of the progressive agenda or we will never be able to achieve our goals.

And that is equally true when it comes to national security. Because of our fiscal recklessness, we are undermining our ability to lead the world in the way that I think it should be lead.

You know, we have done so little to send the message to friend and foe alike that the United States wants to lift up the rest of the world, not put it down.

(APPLAUSE)

We want to be partners, not opponents.

We borrow money -- $60 billion of it -- every month to maintain the Republican Party's spending habits. And where do we go to borrow that money? Well, we go to China or Saudi Arabia or Japan or South Korea.

Recently, the top 10 holders of American debt -- guess who broke in as number 10? Mexico.

(LAUGHTER)

I believe in maintaining our own fiscal sovereignty. But we're giving it away.

And when I travel around upstate New York -- and we have so many wonderful people who have seen the plants close and move to China or move somewhere else and they come up to me and they say, "Senator, why can't we get tough on China?" And I'll say, "Well, I agree with you. They manipulate currency. They steal our intellectual property. They don't abide by the rule of law and contracts. But do you know how tough it is to crack down on your banker?"

(LAUGHTER)

You know, this administration has rendered us weak.

CLINTON: You know, they have the toughest rhetoric in the world. They must watch old cowboy movies 24 hours a day.

(LAUGHTER)

But when it comes to actually being tough and strong, they leave a lot to be desired.

We need to be building alliances -- instead of alienation -- around the world. And we need to be reaching out in an effective way to fight HIV/AIDS, TB, malaria.

(APPLAUSE)

I have legislation that calls for the United States to help put children in school around the world.

(APPLAUSE)

It is not only the right thing to do particularly because so many girls are left out of school...

(APPLAUSE)

... but it would help provide an alternative to the madrasas that teach hate.

You know, if you're a poor villager somewhere and somebody comes to you and says, "Would you like your son to have an education?" you're going to jump at the chance, because there's no school in your area.

I've been in so many of these countries. Sometimes they build a concrete building with maybe a chalkboard and a few chairs and that's the school. There's no place for students to go after the sixth grade, or maybe there's a place down the road that the boys can go but nobody will let their girls travel alone.

And so when someone comes and says to that village family, "Would you like your son to have an education?" well, the answer is most likely going to be, "Of course. We dream of it." So off they go to these madrasas, where they don't learn; they are given a view of the world. They memorize the Koran in a language that is often not their own.

And that's what passes for their education.

CLINTON: And they are taught to fear the modern world. They are taught to hate freedom and our values.

So why doesn't the United States go on record and say, "We're going to help send children to school so that they can be part of the new world we want to build together, that they won't be taken advantage of, they won't be turned into jihadists or terrorists"?

(APPLAUSE)

Many of us have said -- and I know many of you in this room have said that we want to support our troops. And we should. These young men and women are among the very best we have to offer.

And we need to keep faith with them and make sure they have the body armor, the vehicles and the other equipment, materials and training they need.

(APPLAUSE)

And now that there is a new Iraqi government, something that many of us have been waiting for and pushing for, then this Iraqi government needs to be told they have to take responsibility for their own security and stability...

(APPLAUSE)

... that there must be a plan that will begin to bring our troops home...

(APPLAUSE)

... because they have to take the priority of making sure that they have a unified government that stands up to the militias, stands up to the death squads. That is not the job of the American military.

(APPLAUSE)

Our job is to do everything we can to help this government succeed. And it will be difficult and dangerous. But I am hopeful that the administration -- which doesn't listen to any of us, anyway -- will finally realize that the policies it has pursued from the very beginning, when they rushed to war, when they refused to let the U.N. inspectors conduct and complete their mission, when they committed strategic blunder after blunder, has undermined America's leadership in the world and has put at risk the long-term war against terrorism.

CLINTON: Since 2003, the United Nations has been on record as saying, "We must try to help Iraq succeed as an independent, democratic government able to take care of its own security and run its own affairs."

That is why Zarqawi targeted the U.N. mission. Because the U.N. understood that once we were in this situation that was a determined decision by the decider about what he was going to do...

(LAUGHTER)

... we had to work our way out of it.

And that is what I and the majority of senators on both sides have gone on record for. We voted in a bipartisan way to make it clear that this was a year of transition.

But I have to just say it: I do not think it is a smart strategy either for the president to continue with his open-ended commitment, which I think does not put enough pressure on the new Iraqi government, nor do I think it is smart strategy to set a date certain. I do not agree that that is in the best interest of our troops or our country.

(APPLAUSE)

PROTESTER: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: It is also important that we recognize the real dangers we face. And sometimes this is a difficult conversation...

PROTESTER: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: ... in part, because this administration has made our world more dangerous than it should have been.

We were united as a nation after 9/11. We had a commitment that we were going to go after the people who had attacked our country. And this administration didn't follow through.

CLINTON: And now we have problems in Afghanistan, we have problems in Iran, we have problems in North Korea, we have a really competitive challenge from China.

We need steady, smart leadership. And the only way we can begin to get that is to elect a Democratic Congress that can hold this administration accountable and ask the hard questions and chart the new course that we need.

(APPLAUSE)

And the second most important thing to do is to have a new energy policy so that we are not dependent upon regimes that are going to undermine our security, our economy and our environment.

(APPLAUSE)

So there is a lot of work to be done. And I have been inspired and energized by the activism and the commitment to a new progressive agenda. It is what I have worked for and cared about my entire adult life.

But if we're going to win in November, then we have to be smarter, tougher and better prepared than our opponents, because one thing they do know how to do is win.

And we have to reach out to people who may not yet agree with us. And we have to talk about the range of issues that are on their minds that they talk about around the kitchen tables.

We have to ask them if they're satisfied with a government that is undermining personal privacies, civil liberties, civil rights, our constitutional democracy, because I don't think most Americans are.

I've increasingly had Republicans come to me and say that they've had enough. And I said, "Well, why? What's happened?" And they say, "I didn't sign up for all of this." "What do you mean by 'this'?"

For some, it's the deficit and the reckless fiscal policies. For some it was the unbelievably shameless exploitation of Terri Schiavo and her family in a moment of great tragedy.

(APPLAUSE)

For some it was the assault on Social Security. For some it is the Iraq war and our failure to protect our homeland with the incompetent policies and misplaced priorities of this administration.

For nearly everyone it was Katrina. How could we let that happen?

Well, the best way we can prevent it from ever happening again is to stand up, stand up for progressive values and progressive politics, but stand up for winning elections, because we can yell at the TV. Now that I have TiVo, I yell at it again.

(LAUGHTER)

But we've got to win elections or it won't matter.

So let's make sure our elections are of integrity. Let's make sure we count every vote. And let's take back the Congress in November and begin our return to take back our country.

Thank you and God bless you.

(APPLAUSE)

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY) DELIVERS REMARKS ON PRIVACY RIGHTS TO THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION SOCIETY FOR LAW & POLICY CONVENTION, 6/16/2006

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Paul. It is wonderful to be here this morning and I greatly appreciate the opportunity to come before you and speak on a topic that is timely every day -- once again today: namely, privacy rights.

It's a little bit daunting, though, to be introduced by someone who's one of the great practitioners of privacy rights law, as Paul is.

You know, the depth of experience that ACS now represents is a big part of the success of this organization, from Paul to your executive director, Lisa Brown, to your founder, Peter Rubin and many others who are part of this movement.

Since I spoke at the founding convention three years ago, ACS has grown exponentially. And you're filling an unmet need for a rigorous legal approach that is true at its core to the values of human dignity, individual liberties and access to justice on which our nation is founded.

And your Constitution in the 21st Century project, from Harold Koh on torture to Pamela Karlin on the Voting Rights Act, is doing great work. So I want to thank all of you for everything you are doing and urge you to keep making your voices heard on these essential issues.

I am giving a speech today about one of the most important issues facing us as individuals and as a nation.

I believe we are a country headed in the wrong direction in many ways, and it's time to take some fundamental changes in direction in order to make our economy work for all people, to protect our national security in a realistic, effective way and preserve our values.

Well, privacy is at a crossroad of all of these issues. And modern life makes many things easier and many things easier to know. And yet privacy is somehow caught in the cross-hairs of these changes.

Our economy is increasingly data-driven. We've dramatically ramped up surveillance, in our efforts to fight terrorists who hide among innocent civilians. But every day, the news contains a story of how the records of millions of consumers, veterans, patients have been compromised.

At all levels, the privacy protections for ordinary citizens are broken, inadequate and out of date.

Back when I was in law school, the dark ages -- that's actually what our dean at the time called it...

(LAUGHTER)

... the first thing we learned about the right to privacy was that it sprung from the mind of Louis Brandies, beginning with a Law Review article in the 1890s and later in the famous Olmstead dissent that first set out what later courts have recognized as our constitutional right to privacy.

Justice Brandeis, as I'm sure you all recall, wrote that the framers recognized the significance of man's spiritual nature, of his feelings and of his intellect. They sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions and their sensations.

As Brandeis put it, "The Constitution confers the right to be let alone -- the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men." The right to be left alone.

Now, I can just imagine some of you thinking, "What on Earth would I know about that?"

(LAUGHTER)

I'm sure you might find it slightly ironic for me to have chosen the topic of privacy for this talk, since I seem to have so little of it in my own life.

Now, my experience with privacy policy has been, let us say, unique. I'm not the victim of identity theft, though I do sometimes see myself referred to in the media and wondering who they're talking about.

(LAUGHTER)

But having lost so much of my own privacy in recent years, I have a deep appreciation of its value and a firm commitment to protecting it for all the rest of you.

(LAUGHTER)

And I hope that you will take these remarks with that thought in mind, since I am an expert in the perils of losing your privacy.

CLINTON: Most people cherish their privacy, that fundamental desire to be let alone. They see it as essential to their liberty that they be able to go about their daily business free from surveillance and interference.

And yet in modern society without greater safeguards we are all open books to whomever has access to the data we create every day, from credit cards to store cameras to phone company records.

The challenge we face is how to take advantage of all the advantages of technology without losing something precious, which is, I think, the challenge that we confront individually and as a society.

Now fortunately, we have a uniquely American way of thinking about the privacy challenges we face. It's as old as our Constitution and as new as the firewalls on the Internet. It's called checks and balances.

Now that has a specific constitutional meaning to all of you in this room today, but it also has a broader, colloquial meaning that is part of the genius of American society, our ability to balance and safeguard our cherished values, even as we take full advantage of new innovations.

I believe it's not just a possibility, but a necessity that we preserve our right to privacy while we also participate freely in the modern world and defend our national security.

But if we keep going as we are there will be little left of that cherished right. Every phone call, every Internet search, every credit card purchase, they are all under potential surveillance from business and government, unless we start to draw the line, reinforce people's basic rights, and put checks and balances into our system.

Now privacy and national security have gone hand in hand since America's beginning. When the framers adopted the Fourth Amendment, they had in mind the intrusive and threatening searches that British authorities felt free to carry out on a whim.

Well, we're reminded of that again today, with the Supreme Court's decision. The value of the Fourth Amendment is as strong and important now as it was back when British soldiers were garrisoned involuntarily in people's homes.

The 1967 Katz decision demonstrated how this right evolves with technology, establishing a right to privacy respecting wiretaps. So too, the 2001 opinion by Justice Scalia prohibiting the police from using a thermal image to scan a home without a warrant.

Privacy is not and should not be a liberal value or a conservative value. It is, fundamentally, an American value. It is a human value.

Privacy means security in our homes and in our private communications and activities. It is synonymous with liberty in the sense that every person enjoys a zone of freedom that government may not violate.

And we have to operate from a presumption that the Fourth Amendment means that no matter how easily our privacy can be violated, that we still have a basic right to protect the collection and dissemination of information about ourselves from our government.

Now we have to remember that we also have to remember that we also have to start all analysis of privacy with this basic notion: Individuals have a right to privacy unless there is a compelling reason to breach it.

CLINTON: But privacy is not to be the exception. It is the standard.

Today our privacy comes into uncertain conflict with security cameras, data mining, computer hackers and identity theft. We're concerned not just with government actions, but with the ability of the private sector -- even our neighbors -- to misuse or provide insufficient protection for our personal information.

So, therefore, we do need legal protections that are up to date with the technological and national security needs of our time for a world in which we can be confident that our security and our privacy are both protected. And that's what I would like to propose today.

Well, right now many Americans are frightened and confused about losing their privacy. We see patterns of carelessness and outright fraud at the same time as we are exposed to data-gathering and marketing gimmicks at every turn.

According to the nonprofit Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, the personal information of more than one in four Americans -- 85 million people -- has been compromised in just the last 15 months.

Now, some of these were massive breaches, like the theft of a single Veterans Administration laptop with the Social Security numbers and medical information of 26.5 million people.

Just this year, in my state of New York, an armed robbery in New Jersey netted private information on 17,000 patients from a New York hospital. A hacker broke into a retail Web site in Buffalo and stole credit card data. Data tapes for virtually every employee of the Long Island Railroad were lost by a delivery service.

Two laptops full of employee data were stolen from Verizon. A hard drive containing information on 300,000 certified public accountants was lost in shipment. A laptop with bank account information was stolen from a subcontractor in Buffalo.

Now, that's more than half a million people affected in less than six months in one state.

And the personal stories can be heartbreaking. My office has heard from a minister, harassed wrongly by credit agencies; a woman whose trusted tax adviser opened bank accounts and stole money in her name; a breast cancer patient whose mammography records were lost.

CLINTON: But at the same time, Americans are asking: Privacy at what price -- when we are confronted by criminals and terrorists who respect none of our core values? Terrorists don't hesitate to use modern information technology, cell phones and the Internet, and we need to be able to track them.

Meanwhile, new techniques like data-mining have changed many of the things we thought we knew about surveillance.

Americans are genuinely unsure about whether we can keep both our privacy and our security. But this is one of the most fundamental questions about what kind of country we will be. How we greet the challenges of more connected, data-driven world like our own while preserving our core values requires that we take a new comprehensive policy look at what to do to promote a true privacy agenda.

I'm proposing that we have a new privacy bill of rights that secures the interests of consumers, provides stronger, better enforced protection for medical privacy, and a new national security consensus, setting out clear rules to allow the government to use new intelligence techniques within a rule of law framework and making sure that the public knows its rights and the government's limits.

When you talk about privacy, we can start where most people live, which is consumer privacy. Few of us would go back to the days when we made all our purchases with cash and we could only get money out of the bank during what used to be called "bankers' hours."

In fact, information technology often makes us and our personal information safer. We don't have to carry large amounts of cash around. We can pay bills electronically rather than by mail.

But the public doesn't feel more secure. And with stories like ChoicePoint or Bank America or the V.A. theft in the news, they have good reason not to.

So we need a new set of consumer protections that boil down to three basic rights. First, people have the right to know and to correct information which is being kept about them.

Second, people have the right to know what is happening to their personal information when they are cooperating with a business and to make decisions about how their information is used.

And third, in a democracy, people have the right and the obligation to hold their government and the private sector to the highest standards of care with the information they gather.

These rights should be basic to all of the commercial transactions we undertake and be part of a basic privacy bill of rights that has to be adhered to by every commercial information gatherer or marketer.

CLINTON: Now, my privacy bill of rights will be encapsulated in the Protect Act, which stands for -- you know, when you're in the Congress you have to find acronyms.

(LAUGHTER)

You spend hours figuring out how to describe your legislation in words that can then spell something.

(LAUGHTER)

So I give my staff full credit for this.

But the Protect Act, which stands for Privacy Rights and Oversight for Electronic and Commerce Transactions.

Pretty good, huh?

(LAUGHTER)

This legislation not only provides clear privacy rules, but it gives clear protections for your most privacy information. The right to sue when those rules have been violated. The right to protect your phone records. The right to freeze your credit when your identity has been stolen. The right to know what businesses are doing with your credit and credit reports. And the right to expect the government to use the best privacy practices itself with your information.

We should start with the principle that for the most deeply personal information about how we spend money on a daily basis, your information should be shared only when you opt in.

We know that a booming industry is tracking every purchase you've made with your debit or credit cards or personal checks. This means that if you failed to check that tiny little opt-out box on your credit card company or your bank privacy statement, there may be a profile on what you read, what you wear, in what size, and what over-the-counter drugs you take and what books and music you buy.

And that profile then may be bought and sold and shared with third parties every day.

The opt-out protections under current law can be helpful, but for some things, the default privacy agreement should be that companies cannot share this information without your explicit agreement to opt in.

Opt-out protection essentially assigns property rights for your personal information to financial institutions, while opt in awards ownership to consumers.

I believe opting in for these types of transactions would reinforce the relatively simple and reasonable concept that you own your information about yourself and you should have control over when, how or if it is shared.

The foundation of our legal system is the right to seek redress through the courts. Right now we have no set definitions of what privacy violations cost the individual and little incentive for banks and other businesses in many instances to protect your data with the highest level of security.

As a result, it is very hard for consumers to sue. Legislation I'll introduce will create a tiered system of damages, exempting the smallest business with set minimums of $1,000 for breaches and $5,000 for actual misuse of information.

CLINTON: The burden of prevention belongs on the companies that handle our data.

We established this principle for stolen credit cards in the 1968 Truth in Lending Act. And that has spawned a whole industry of credit card protections which is constantly improving to outwit thieves.

We need the same standards for other information.

Right now, the rules covering data processors are unclear, especially in cases where projects are outsourced. We need the FTC to issue a single clear set of rules that provides comprehensive protection against unauthorized access or security breaches.

Right now, it's too easy to purchase, post or trade cell phone numbers and records. Canadian government officials, journalists, even General Wes Clark have had their cell phone numbers and records sold to anyone willing to put up the money.

And those are just the cases we know about, because reporters and bloggers were doing the buying to draw attention to the threat.

Buying and selling that kind of information is a gross invasion of personal privacy. But it's not clear that it is a crime. And this is only going to get more challenging as consumers move to phone service based on broadband Internet technology, for which no regulations currently exist.

My legislation will try to get ahead of the curve of technology, making sure that consumers' private cell phone numbers and call records remain private.

Right now, if you've been victimized, you can place a credit alert but you cannot freeze your credit.

CLINTON: If you're a veteran concerned about your credit because your Social Security number has been compromised, you should be able to call Equifax and say no access and no new credit.

We also have to strengthen the right to know provisions. If your credit or identity is compromised, you should be notified immediately, not days, weeks, even months later. Because this is required in some states, but not all, a large percentage of identity theft victims are unaware that anything has happened to put their information at risk.

Some firms are now sending data abroad for processing, away from the protections of U.S. law. As inadequate as it is, at least it is a framework better than you'll find in most of the rest of the world.

The potential dangers of this practice are illustrated by the case of an employee in a Pakistani data center, doing cut-rate clerical work for an American medical center, who threatened to post patients' confidential files on the Internet unless she was paid more money.

Moreover, last year, employees doing data processing work for an Indian outsourcing company stole $350,000 from four Citibank customers.

Last year I proposed the safe ID bill, which ensures that consumers will be notified when their personal data is sent abroad, and they should have the right to opt out.

This would have two benefits. Again, putting the control of information in your own hands, but also sending a message to other countries that if they want to continue employing people in this very lucrative, rapidly growing area of information handling, they need to strengthen their own laws.

The credit industry makes its profits from information that determines whether you can buy a home or send your child to college. You ought to have that information provided to you once a year without paying a fee or jumping through hoops. It shouldn't be a goldplated, extra fee service to let consumers know when someone changes their credit ratings. And we need to make that standard practice.

Across the federal government, privacy concerns are not getting the priority attention they deserve. The results are embarrassing to this administration and unacceptable for citizens whose privacy and security may be at risk from their own government's sloppy practices.

That's why the Protect Act would create a high-level privacy czar in the Office of Management and Budget.

CLINTON: A chief privacy officer for our government would have oversight into the working of every government department and power to make sure that the law is being followed and best practices being implemented.

We had such a position in the Clinton administration, but the current administration chose not to follow that model.

There's no better example why we need a so-called privacy czar than the theft last month of the personal data of those 26.5 million veterans and more than 1 million active-duty service men and women.

And just yesterday we learned that an off-shore medical transcription subcontractor for the V.A. threatened to post the medical histories and health information of over 30,000 veterans online over a payment dispute.

This tells us that the oversight of data-processing procedures at the management level of our federal agencies is insufficient at best, since several V.A. officials, including the director, were not even aware that their contractors were sending the most sensitive information of our veterans to countries with few privacy and data- security regulations.

It's part of the reason we need the safe I.D. protections I mentioned earlier, but we need to go farther. This week, I joined with Democratic colleagues to demand accountability from the administration for this personal data theft of millions of records. We're asking that the U.S. comptroller general conduct an in-depth study to get the facts on this breach and address the vulnerabilities that led to it.

We also introduced legislation to establish federal penalties for people who knowingly use personal or health information from a federal database.

The theft of this data and the administration's lax response is a disgrace. Soldiers serving in harm's way should not have to bear the additional burden of worrying about identity theft, and we need to get to the bottom of this to prevent it from happening again.

Perhaps if we'd had the office of the chief privacy officer this might not have happened or would have come to light much sooner.

We also face a critical balancing act in the area of health privacy. Patients' lives may depend on sharing their most intimate information.

CLINTON: Our ability to control costs and improve the quality of health care certainly depends on moving away from paper-based medicine to information superhighway medicine.

I've worked with Newt Gingrich on this. And when Newt and I agree, you know something unusual is happening.

(LAUGHTER)

Newt likes to say, "When it comes to medicine, paper kills." And he's absolutely right. But if we can't assure Americans that their information is safe, we won't be able to move forward on Health Information Technology, that I believe will save billions of dollars, improve care, and reduce error rates.

We had no federal protections for health information at all until the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act, also known as HIPAA -- a different kind of acronym -- was enacted under the Clinton administration.

HIPAA provided important protections of patients' most private information, their medical information. HIPAA provides a baseline, but the business of health care is changing fast, and information technology is changing even faster.

Consumers are getting care and risking their information in ways that no one could have foreseen a few years ago. And this administration's indifference toward HIPAA and its enforcement has made even the protections we have utterly inadequate.

Now, HIPAA is not without practical challenges. There's still confusion about the rules for releasing information to relatives, for example. We're still trying to strike the right balance between promoting research into diseases and protecting an individual's information.

We need to build on the base HIPAA provides by improving enforcement and making sure we have one set of high standards for everyone who deals with health information.

HIPAA was designed to have teeth, government monitoring, fines, legal actions against companies that violate the law. But instead of spot checks and audits, HHS waits for a complaint and then investigates.

There have been well over, I think, 35,000 complaints at the last count and not a single civil monetary penalty has been imposed. This is clearly not working. And because of lax enforcement, we're now seeing compliance with HIPAA on the decline because people know they won't be held responsible.

What's more, the Department of Justice ruled last year that employees of HIPAA-covered entities, like hospitals, for example, are not themselves automatically liable and, therefore, may not be held accountable for illegally accessing or misusing private information.

And hackers who break into computer systems that are covered in institutions that are accountable to HIPAA may also not be liable.

Now, this penalizes businesses that are serious about protecting privacy, and it penalizes Americans when they're most vulnerable.

CLINTON: We need to get back into balance on protecting medical information and enforcing the rules that we do have.

Now, consumers have all kinds of online options in health care. They can go to sites like WebMD for medical advice. They can create Internet-based personal health records that keep all their information in one place.

But HIPAA doesn't protect you if these new services violate your privacy. So we need to strengthen federal protection so there is no debate: Everyone who traffics in your health information is accountable, period, no exceptions.

And with the rapid growth of DNA databases and the many uses of genetic information on the horizon, we must also ensure that this information is protected to prevent genetic discrimination.

In 2000, my husband issued an executive order banning genetic discrimination in the federal workplace. I've been working with my colleagues in the Senate to enact legislation to ensure that these protections apply to the private sector.

Developments in science should move us forward, not reverse progress, and discrimination based on genetic information to get a job, to get insurance, could be a devastating blow to so many people if this is left unchecked. so many people if this is left unchecked.

CLINTON: And finally, when it comes to national security, we have seen, to our dismay, that this administration is not doing a good enough job in protecting personal information of veterans, Medicare and Medicaid patients. And we have grave doubts about whether it even cares to protect personal information about citizens.

We learned just a couple of days ago, that in September of last year, a computer hacker was able to steal the personal records of at least 1,500 employees and contractors of the National Nuclear Security Administration. That is the federal agency charged with guarding our country's nuclear weapons stockpile.

This time, it was personal information. Next time, who knows what kind of information will be compromised or how either forms of information could be used.

The writing is on the wall. It is in neon. It is time to get serious about cybersecurity.

Unfortunately, the task of beefing up our cybersecurity has been kicked around multiple offices at the Department of Homeland Security. Several political appointees have quit in frustration.

We are just living on borrowed time. We need to make sure we are better prepared against cyberattacks than we turned out to be against hurricanes.

We also face the challenge of balancing the vital role that information technology plays in defending our national security with our citizens' rights to privacy.

So much of what we know about terrorists and the successes we've had in preventing and thwarting attacks and tracking would-be perpetrators has been through information technology. We track terrorists across continents through their cell phones. We monitor terrorists and their supporters through Internet chat rooms.

We had phone intercepts that should have given us advance notice of 9/11, if we had been paying attention.

Now, although our founders could not have imagined data mining or terrorist cells, they did anticipate differences of opinion between the executive and legislative branches and even within them. And they created the system of checks and balances enshrined in our Constitution.

Now, I believe that the president -- and I mean any president -- must have the ability to pursue terrorists and defend our national security with the best technology at hand. But we have existing laws that allow that.

CLINTON: The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or so-called FISA; we have judicial mechanism in place that this administration could have used to obtain authority for what it did.

We have a system of congressional oversight and review that this administration could have used to obtain a legislative solution to these challenges.

Instead, they relied on questionable legal authority and bypassed our system of checks and balances.

In the months since NSA's activities have come to light, both the legislative branch and the judiciary have attempted to learn more about the administration's surveillance programs.

In denying Congress and the courts any information, the administration's refrain has been: "Trust us."

They've used it to justify frustrating legislative oversight, denying the Department of Justice's Office of Professional Responsibility the clearances they needed to conduct an internal investigation. And just a few days ago, we learned that they are now invoking the state secret exception to shut down any judicial review of their conduct through assertion of that privilege.

That's unacceptable. Their track record does not warrant our trust.

Now this has been the subject of numerous decisions, not on this point exactly, but going back years. And in Justice Douglas' concurrence in the Katz warrantless wiretapping case in 1967, he said it very clearly and I think it still applies today:

"Neither the president nor the attorney general is a magistrate. In matters where they believe national security may be involved, they are not detached, disinterested and neutral as a court or magistrate must be. Under the separation of powers created by the Constitution, the executive branch is not supposed to be neutral and disinterested.

"I cannot agree that, where spies and saboteurs are involved, adequate protection of Fourth Amendment rights is assured, when the president and the attorney general assume both the position of adversary and prosecutor and disinterested neutral magistrate."

The answer to this delicate security dilemma is neither blank checks nor blanket opposition; it is to use the judicial and legislative mechanisms we have to build a consensus about what is necessary, what is legal and what is effective.

So first, Congress must have an oversight role and help decide where to draw the line between privacy and national security.

CLINTON: But we can't draw anything without knowing the facts. At a minimum, the House and Senate Intelligence and Judiciary Committees are entitled to know on a confidential basis, when and wherever necessary, the full extent and rationale for any electronic surveillance program.

If the executive needs additional authority to legitimately monitor and track terrorists, it should not just simply overlook and ignore the law. If the president feels he needs more flexibility in order to protect our security, he should engage Congress.

As our technology and methods become more advanced and creative, so should the protections we build into our system of checks and balances. It is a cause for deep concern that the administration did not seek changes to the FISA law to legitimize its surveillance program, but instead deliberately chose to act outside of the law.

Second, the judiciary has a critical role to play in guarding our privacy from unnecessary government intrusion. As a general rule, when the government wants to conduct electronic surveillance in the United States, it must go before a judge and obtain a warrant. There is no evidence that the courts have not taken seriously the national security imperatives asserted by the executive branch and effectively protected the security of sensitive information.

The FISA courts have a proven track record of being able to protect our security and privacy simultaneously. We can allow for carefully defined exceptions to the warrant requirement in the immediate aftermath of war and allowances can be made for greater flexibility. For example, warrants after the fact in cases of true emergencies. But as Justice Harlan said in the Katz case, warrants are the general rule.

Third, any framework for domestic surveillance must ultimately facilitate, not hinder effective intelligence gathering to prevent terrorism. Our surveillance capabilities must have speed, agility and flexibility. They must also be accurate, both to minimize false positives, which unduly burden the rights of innocent people, and false negatives, which leave potential dangers undetected.

CLINTON: This can all be done within our system of checks and balances and within the rule of law.

The rule of law is not an obstacle, despite what some in the executive branch seem to believe. In fact, the rule of law facilitates our safety and security. Without clear rules, our intelligence analysts don't have guidance on how they should gather intelligence. The intelligence they do collect is distributed haphazardly throughout government agencies. And useful intelligence that could help bring terrorists to justice could be rendered worthless because it was gathered through extra-legal means.

If we want to protect our security and our privacy, we need clear guidelines, and we need to get smart about technologies.

One promising approach suggested by thinkers on both sides of the political spectrum is the use of anonymization. That's technology that protects the privacy of individuals while allowing the government to analyze data. This technology would essentially erase the personal identification attached to information that is monitored unless red flags are triggered.

But whatever our approach, we need to be as creative and imaginative in protecting Americans' privacy as we are in protecting our security. And we need to abandon the idea that privacy and security are somehow mutually exclusive.

You know, in our society, it is the people who have given their collective rights to the government to use only as necessary. The government derives its ability to undertake surveillance only because we have given it a limited right under justified circumstances.

And you don't have to go back many years to document abuses at the highest levels. As a very young lawyer, I worked for the House Judiciary Committee during the Watergate investigation. And our committee found that the president had not only bugged the Democratic National Committee with former CIA operatives, but had also created enemies lists and manipulated IRS audits.

Without the right checks and balances, we found out just how quickly the unthinkable can be done by people whose power is unchecked.

Now as there is a legitimate rush to step up our intelligence for real needs, let's not forget all the lessons we have learned over the past 220 years. What might seem sensible at the moment can be used unscrupulously in the future.

Unchecked mass surveillance without judicial review may sometimes be legal, but it is dangerous. Every president should save those powers for limited, critical situations. And when it comes to a regular program of searching for information that touches the privacy of ordinary Americans, those programs need to be monitored and reviewed as set out by Congress in cooperation with the judiciary.

CLINTON: That is the essence of the compact we have with each other and with our government, and we cannot ignore it.

So we don't need to abandon our cherished rights. We don't need more false debates: liberty versus security, privacy versus danger. What we need is to come together and develop a consensus about how to protect our privacy in a more data-driven and dangerous world.

This issue is too important to be dealt with haphazardly, and it is really too important to be ignored. So let's stand by a few cherished American ideals. Let's think intelligently about how to apply what we now face in the new century within the framework of values that have stood the test of time.

We are, after all, a country built on individual liberty, including individual privacy as well as collective safety and security. We have been very good over the years in resolving the tensions between those two points.

And as we look at the rights of the people and the imperative of the government, we need to see them from the same vantage point, not as competition, but as all of us seeking the kind of results that will make us a safer, freer people.

Our Constitution is fully up to the challenge of protecting our privacy and security. The real question is whether we are up to the challenge of enacting laws and implementing policies that honor that.

Thank you very much.

PRESS CONFERENCE, 6/20/2006

PRESS CONFERENCE WITH SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA); SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY); SENATOR RICHARD DURBIN (D-IL); REPRESENTATIVE STENY HOYER (D-MD); REPRESENTATIVE DAVID R. OBEY (D-WI); AND REPRESENTATIVE GEORGE MILLER (D-CA)

SUBJECT: RAISING THE MINIMUM WAGE

LOCATION: SENATE RADIO/TV GALLERY, THE CAPITOL, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, we all feel very strongly about this because what's happening is just wrong. This Congress is not acting on the priorities of the American people.

And we know that this minimum wage increase will mean the world to millions of men but particularly women, like Congressman Obey's mother, who's trying to keep body and soul together and put food on the table for her children.

It has been nine long years that this Congress has refused to give a raise for people working minimum-wage jobs, but sure take care of themselves time and time again. We're trying to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour over two years.

We know its real value has eroded. We know that a minimum-wage worker -- let's take a single mom with two kids who works 40 hours a week, 52 weeks a year, earns just $10,700 a year. That is almost $6,000 below the federal poverty line. And we're telling this hard-working mom, "Sorry, you're just not important enough for us to even vote on it." And we're saying, "You're just not important enough for the Republican majority to pass it."

Raising the minimum wage will make a real difference. This is not just, you know, some kind of side event that's going on here. We're talking about real money in the pockets of real working people. A minimum wage of $7.25 would mean an additional $4,400 a year. To pay for the rising cost of gas because of this administration and Republican majority's bad energy policies. To pay for food. To pay for health care and prescription drugs. To pay for tuition. To pay for all the necessities of life. It would mean enough money for a low-income family of three to buy 15 months of groceries, 19 months of utilities, 20 months of child care or two years of health care.

Now, my good friend Senator Kennedy and I have joined forces to introduce the Standing With Minimum-Wage Earners Act, which would also raise the minimum wage and link future increases to congressional pay raises, because as we know, we're continuing to give ourselves pay raises while we let other people just languish while the cost of everything goes up.

So I think the government should level the playing field and give people who work hard and play by the rules a raise.

Every day that we don't raise it, the value decreases. And if Congress continues to turn a blind eye, shame on the Republicans. I wish every minimum-wage worker in America could be here with us today and could tell his or her story about how hard they work, how early they get up, how late they stay up in order to do the jobs that are paying below the level of poverty for a family in our country.

So let's honor work. Let's honor people who play by the rules. And let's do the right thing and raise the minimum wage, finally, after nine long years.

REP. HOYER: I am pleased to join Senator Kennedy, Senator Clinton, David Obey, and my good friend, George Miller. George Miller and I have been working very hard on this minimum wage issue, joined by David Obey, on the House side. In fact, we offered the minimum wage increase to the Labor/Health bill just seven days ago. It passed, it passed with seven Republican votes and unanimous votes of Democrats -- 32 to 27. Mr. Obey and I and Mr. Mollohan offered it again today on another bill that could come to the floor and make this issue a reality for this 6.6 million Americans who rely on the minimum wage, and the other millions who rely on their earning capacity to help support their family. Those Republicans stuck with the minimum-wage earners just as long as they could -- about seven days. None of them voted for that raise today. Now, I can't explain that, and I'll bet nobody earning the minimum wage can explain that.

You've heard that this is the second-longest time that we've gone without raising the minimum wage -- from 1997 to today. It's the second. But nobody has mentioned the first. The first was the eight years of Ronald Reagan and the first two years of George Bush. Do you see an analogy there? Where Republicans are focused on giving Paris Hilton a tax cut when she inherits money. Now, I know everybody in America is worried about Paris Hilton and whether or not she has enough resources to get by day to day.

Ladies and gentlemen, this is an issue of fairness, this is an issue of what's right in America. And in fact, that's not Ted Kennedy, Hillary Clinton, George Miller and David Obey speaking, it is 81 percent of Americans when polled say it's the right thing to do to raise the minimum wage, because they know when you work hard and play by the rules, you ought not to live in poverty in the richest nation on the face of the earth.

We're going to keep fighting to raise the minimum wage (sic) until it passes, until we get a decent level of living.

In America, we expect people to work if they can. And we expect people to work because them to play their role in building our country and making it great. And if we expect them to work, they expect us to pay them a wage that is not keeping them in poverty. I hope the Republicans on both the Senate side and on the House side will let this matter just come to a vote.

It was supposed to be in the Labor-Health bill this week on the floor of the House of Representatives. The Republicans pulled that bill. I think they're pulling it because they're fearful that there will be enough Republicans who understand it's the right thing to do, or understand that the voters expect them to do it, so that it would pass. And apparently, the overwhelming majority of Republicans and their leadership don't want to do what is fair, what is right for working men and women in this country who are working at the very lowest levels, but who are making our country go. I hope they change their minds. We need to pass an increase in the minimum wage so that not 10 years will pass before we give consideration to those folks.

George Miller.

REP. MILLER: Thank you very much, and I'm honored to join my colleagues.

You all know the issues surrounding the minimum wage. What we're reduced to here today is to plead with three leaders of the Congress -- Speaker Dennis Hastert, Majority Leader John Boehner, and Majority Leader Bill Frist -- and ask them in the name of simple decency and simple fairness and simple respect for America's families to increase the minimum wage.

Think what it means to these families where you get up and you go to work every day, all day long, and at the end of the year you end up poor. And you've done it for nine years without an increase, and yet you're trying to provide health care for your children. And you say, well, they have Medicaid. But the fact of the matter is, all of them are now being faced with deductibles, copayments, all of the increases that we see in prescription drugs as the states cut back. You're trying to provide an education, and you're getting lectures from Dennis Hastert and Bill Frist and John Boehner that you have to save more for your retirement because they're going to privatize Social Security and take it away. You're getting the lecture that you have to provide your health care. You're getting the lecture that you have to provide your children's education, you have to contribute more. And for nine years you haven't gotten an increase.

Who are these people to lecture these people about providing for their families when they won't make the basic law of this United States, the basic wage law of this United States, fair and decent for these families who go to work every day and end up poor?

Who are these leaders in Congress to suggest that these people can do more on less? As my colleagues have pointed out each and every one of these years, we've been provided a COLA. If they would have simply given these workers a COLA, it would have meant thousands and thousands of dollars to them over that nine-year period of time in which they could have provided for their families. They could have given their kids something extra. They might have even been able to set a little bit aside. They certainly may have been able to better meet the increased fuel cost or repair the car because we know they travel greater distances by public transportation and older cars.

Everything works against these families, and yet they go to work every day, but we don't respect their work. This Congress has got to change its course. It's got to go in a new direction. It's got to respect these families and their effort and what they do every day, and it's got to raise the minimum wage in the name of simple decency and fairness to the American public.

Dick?

SEN. DURBIN: I'm glad to join my colleagues from both the House and the Senate in support of this increase in the minimum wage. There was a time when this was not a political football. There was a time when presidents of both political parties considered this a moral obligation -- to increase the minimum wage periodically so people would keep up with the cost of living. But unfortunately, over the last nine years, it's become extremely political. A Republican Congress and a Republican president have said "no" repeatedly. It just strikes me as odd that the same party that wants to preach to us about the values and family values obviously doesn't value the families that are working hard every day to try to keep their kids together and their family together under the worst possible circumstances. These families need a helping hand. The cost of living continues to increase.

But we don't have time to deal with the minimum wage. See, we have to cut the estate tax. We have to spend our time eliminating the tax on the wealthiest people in America. Our problem is clearly, from the Republican point of view, we are not spending enough time worrying about those who are so comfortable and so well off. Well, frankly, I think we have an obligation in our society to consider those who are working hard, who are part of America and look for representation in this chamber, in the Senate and in the House. They don't have well- paid lobbyists, that's for sure. They don't have them roaming the halls and attending our fundraisers. But they're the people who make up America and have made it great. They're the ones who really believe this is a land of opportunity, but they want a chance, they want an opportunity with a decent wage.

In the nine years that we have failed to increase the minimum wage, we have not failed to increase the wage of members of Congress. It's gone up over $31,000 in that same period of time. That is disgraceful. It is shameful. I think we should be paid what we are worth, that's for sure, but we ought to pay these people what they are worth, and they're certainly worth a heck of a lot more than $5.15 an hour.

I'm going to support Senator Kennedy's effort in the Senate. I think $7.25 over two years is not unreasonable. It'll give people about $4,400 more a year. It'll give them perhaps an extra dollar to be spent on quality day-care. So instead of leaving your child with that person nextdoor you're not too sure of, you might be able to leave that baby with somebody you can really trust. It'll mean being able to pay for some dental care, which today they can't pay for, or medical care or the basics of life which we all take for granted. It's long overdue.

Q Senator Kennedy, what's your plan for getting this to a vote in the Senate? Have you decided when you're going to offer this?

SEN. KENNEDY: When I introduced the legislation yesterday, it was going to be on a second degree to the Nelson amendment, and I was going to file the cloture petition on it, which would have guaranteed that we would have had a vote on Wednesday. The majority leader had indicated that he would give the assurance to those of us who are supporting increase in the minimum wage that we will get a vote on this prior to the time that cloture is enacted. And at the present time we're -- the two leaders are working out the time.

There is some possibility that it will be this afternoon, I think more likely probably tomorrow morning.

We were given the Republican alternative about 35 minutes ago, five minutes before I came in here. Our increase in minimum wage is effectively a page. It's on two pages, but it is one page long. Their alternative is 70 pages, and 52 pages are tax cuts for various industries. And that is being reviewed now by the Finance Committee and by the Budget Committee. We don't know whether the estate tax has been put in there or what else has been put in there. And it seems that we ought to have the report of the Budget Committee or the Finance Committee as exactly what the implications and what the cost of their proposal would be prior to the time that we vote on it. But there is a guarantee that we will have a vote. I expect there will be an alternative by the Republicans that will be inadequate and will be highly costly in terms of the budget.

Yeah, Rick.

Q Does that mean that the Democrats would not be prepared to support it? I mean, this same thing happened last year, as you recall. That is, the Republican alternative -- (off mike) -- the Democratic version, the Democrats -- (off mike) -- the Republican version. Is that going to --

SEN. KENNEDY: Well, first of all, we're not really sure what's in it. But it was completely inadequate. It was rather a cynical, desperate attempt at that time by Senator Santorum. And I don't think that -- I think people are -- as I mentioned earlier, are men and women of dignity, and I think they deserve more than a tin-cup contribution, myself. But we'll have a chance to review what it would be.

Yes?

Q Senator, is there any scenario under which there could be a straight up-or-down vote where you just need to get 51 to pass it, or is this guaranteed to be something where you need to get to 60? And can you get to 60?

SEN. KENNEDY: Well, it's a challenge to get to 60 votes. We have gotten that in the past. And when we have, if you look over the period in the '90s, we were able to get more than the 50 votes when the House of Representatives showed life, like they're showing now; where Republicans began to show some independence and to show that they were prepared to vote for an increase.

And then, remarkably, Republicans in the Senate showed a willingness to get an increase and we got an increase.

But the only way that we can get a vote is by running through the parliamentary gymnastics which the Republican leadership require us to do, require us to do, and that requires that we'll have to get 60 votes. But we'll do everything that we can that -- and we've been in the low 50s before.

And it seems to me what has been happening in the countryside is the dramatic difference. That is what is influencing, I think, the House and the Senate. You have what has happened in Arkansas, the home of Wal-Mart, moving; when you have what has happened in Florida, what's happened in Nevada, North Carolina -- these -- all across this country there's increasing action in increasing the minimum wage, and in a great many cities, the living wage, which is even significantly above this.

Just a final point on the living wage. What you're finding out in cities -- and the clearest example was Baltimore when they did that, the total cost of government went down because their workers were getting paid more, so they had less turnover, so it was less costly to train people; they had better attendance records, and they had a higher quality of productivity. And so the whole total cost, even though they were paying people more, actually went down. Pretty good lesson that if you treat people decently and fairly, that they're going to perform their duties. And it's too bad that our Republican friends don't understand.

Go ahead.

REP. HOYER: I'd like to make a comment on that question, if I can, because that's going to be an issue in the House. We added the amendment that I offered to the Labor/Health bill. It is, however, legislation on an appropriations bill and it will have to be protected by a waiver in the rule. We're going to make it very clear, and we hope you'll help us make it very clear, that the up-or-down vote to which you refer will be on the rule. Very clearly, if they do not protect the minimum wage, which passed 32 to 7 (sic\27) -- the increase by 70 cents over -- $2.10 over two-and-a-half years, that will be the vote on whether or not a member is prepared to increase the minimum wage.

And as Senator Kennedy mentioned -- I mentioned 81 percent -- he mentioned Florida - 72 percent of the voters in Florida went to the polls and voted to increase their minimum wage and to build in a cost of living escalator. There's no doubt that the overwhelming majority -- 21 states have now got a minimum wage higher, set by state, than we do at the federal level. There's no doubt the public's really behind this.

Q Senator Clinton, one thing that has changed in the last nine years is that there have been a lot of very low-wage jobs created in places like China, with -- where the wages are way below the current U.S. minimum wage. Can you -- how has that fact changed the terms in this debate? Does it affect this debate in any way?

SEN. CLINTON: I don't believe it does, in large measure because many of the minimum wage jobs that people take are jobs that can't be outsourced. You know, they're jobs that are here on the ground, taking care of people in nursing homes, serving people food in restaurants, cleaning up bathrooms in hotels. I mean, these are jobs that are necessary for the economy and are very important to keeping the economy going.

The other point I would make, though, is, we have to do more to competitive, to keep our jobs here, but we can't sacrifice our standard of living and the wages that enable Americans to lead decent lives and give their children better futures. There's no evidence whatsoever by any of the economic studies that I've reviewed which suggests that this would be a job-killer for any reason, including the reason that you mentioned.

Q Senator Clinton, to make a segue from some of the workers that you referred to, some of them are immigrants, some of them are illegal immigrants. And Senator Kennedy, I want your comment as well. Speaker Hastert indicated today that the chairmen of relevant committees in the House would be conducting field hearings. Essentially, it seems that those would be on the Senate bill. Some have said this is a way to kill any sort of immigration bill this year and getting to conference would be impossible if you're doing it over the entire August recess. I wonder what you make of Speaker Hastert's move to do this.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I should let my friends from the House answer that, because they know more about what's going on over there.

From my vantage point, it looks like another effort to score political points by refusing to do what needs to be done to deal with the problems we face in America. You know, there's that old slogan, "The won't-do Congress won't do." And this Congress sure won't do anything that's in the best interests of Americans, so far as I can tell.

And we passed a comprehensive bill over here, and I think, rather than dealing with it, they want to try to score political points. But you know, obviously the folks from the House can answer that.

REP. HOYER: I think the Republican Party is deeply divided on what it wants to do with immigration. The House Republicans are deeply divided from the president of the United States, their president. The president disagrees, essentially, with a lot of Republicans in the Senate. The Senate Republicans disagree with the House Republicans. So they're deeply divided, so in my opinion, this is a device to try to put off the issue, so that they don't highlight their divisions, number one.

Number two, this minimum wage is critical as it relates to that because there's an assertion that, jeez, Americans don't want a lot of these jobs. The fact is Americans can't survive on the salaries that these jobs pay. If we put the salaries up, if we give them a decent wage, then they could take these jobs and there wouldn't be as much incentive for people to come across our border.

SEN. KENNEDY: I think the action by the House of Representatives to reopen a series of hearings on comprehensive immigration reform is a cynical effort to delay or kill a comprehensive immigration bill. This legislation that we had passed in the United States Senate had two and a half years of hearings. We had extensive debate on the floor of the United States Senate.

The House of Representatives is strongly in favor of a criminalization of all the undocumented in this country. They have passed legislation that overwhelmingly reflects that view, that every undocumented will effectively be a felon, and any individual Americans or any group of Americans, any church, any non-governmental agency that helps and assists any of those who are undocumented will also be open to prosecution as assisting felons.

So that has been the attitude and the view of the House of Representatives. And I think many of us in a bipartisan way -- because there's a bipartisan effort -- Senator McCain has been a remarkable leader; Lindsey Graham; Chuck Hagel; the whole series of Republicans have been remarkable leaders in getting a good bill through the United States Senate. And we want to do what the Constitution says that we should do and what I think the broad majority of Americans want us to do, and that is to sit down and work out an effective program that'll reflect many of the ideas of President Bush, who's a strong supporter of a comprehensive approach and will be in the best interest of the security of our country by having strong border security in fairness and ensure appropriate kind of legal enforcement and -- by our employers and also permit an adjustment of status with the penalties which have been outlined in the Senate bill.

Thanks very much.

DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF CONGRESS HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON THE MINIMUM WAGE, 6/20/2006

CLINTON: We all feel very strongly about this, because what's happening is just wrong. This Congress is not acting on the priorities of the American people. And we know that this minimum wage increase will mean the world to millions of men, but particularly women, like Congressman Obey's mother, who's trying to keep body and soul together and put food on the table for her children.

It has been nine long years that this Congress has refused to give a raise for people working minimum wage jobs, but sure take care of themselves time and time again.

CLINTON: We're trying to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour over two years.

We know its real value has eroded. We know that a minimum wage worker -- let's take a single mom with two kids who works 40 hours a week, 52 weeks a year, earns just $10,700 a year.

That is almost $6,000 below the federal poverty line, and we're telling this hardworking mom, "Sorry, you're just not important enough for us to even vote on it," and we're saying, "You're just not important enough to the Republican majority to pass it."

Raising the minimum wage will make a real difference. This is not just, you know, some kind of side event that's going on here; we're talking about real money in the pockets of real working people.

A minimum wage of $7.25 would mean an additional $4,400 a year to pay for the rising costs of gas because of this administration and the Republican majority's bad energy policies; to pay for food; to pay for health care and prescription drugs; to pay for tuition; to pay for all the necessities of life.

It would mean enough money for a low-income family of three to buy 15 months of groceries, 19 months of utilities, 20 months of child care or two years of health care.

Now, my good friend Senator Kennedy and I have joined forces to introduce the Standing with Minimum Wage Earners Act, which would also raise the minimum wage and link future increases to congressional pay raises, because as we know, we're continuing to give ourselves pay raises while we let other people just languish while the cost of everything goes up.

So I think the government should level the playing field and give people who work hard and play by the rules a raise. Every day that we don't raise it, the value decreases. And if Congress continues to turn a blind eye, shame on the Republicans.

CLINTON: I wish every minimum wage worker in America could be here with us today and could tell his or her story about how hard they work, how early they get up, how late they stay up, in order to do the jobs that are paying below the level of poverty for a family in our country.

So let's honor work. Let's honor people who play by the rules. And let's do the right thing and raise the minimum wage, finally, after nine long years.

HOYER: I am pleased to join Senator Kennedy, Senator Clinton, David Obey and my good friend, George Miller. George Miller and I have been working very hard on this minimum wage issue, joined by David Obey, on the House side.

In fact, we offered the minimum wage increase to the Labor Health bill just seven days ago. It passed. It passed with seven Republican votes and unanimous votes of Democrats, 32-27.

Mr. Obey and I and Mr. Mollohan offered it again today on another bill that could come to the floor and make this issue a reality for those 6.6 million Americans who rely on the minimum wage and the other millions who rely on their earning capacity to help support their family.

Those Republicans stuck with the minimum wage earners just as long as they could, about seven days. None of them voted for that raise today.

Now, I can't explain that. And I'll bet nobody earning the minimum wage can explain that.

You've heard that this is the second longest time that we've gone without raising minimum wage, from 1997 to today. It's the second.

But nobody has mentioned the first. The first was the eight years of Ronald Reagan and the first two years of George Bush. Do you see an analogy there?

Where Republicans are focused on giving Paris Hilton a tax cut when she inherits money -- now, I know everybody in America's worried about Paris Hilton, whether or not she has enough resources to get by, day to day.

Ladies and gentlemen, this is an issue of fairness.

HOYER: This is an issue of what's right in America. And in fact that's not Ted Kennedy, Hillary Clinton, George Miller and David Obey speaking; it is 81 percent of Americans when polled say it's the right thing to do to raise the minimum wage, because they know when you work hard and play by the rules you ought not to live in poverty in the richest nation on the face of the Earth.

We're going to keep fighting to raise the minimum wage until it passes, until we give a decent level of living.

In America we expect people to work, if they can, and we expect people to work because we expect them to play their role in building our country and making it great. And if we expect them to work, they expect us to pay them a wage that is not keeping them in poverty.

I hope the Republicans on both the Senate side and on the House side will let this matter just come to a vote. It was supposed to be in the Labor-Health bill this week on the floor of the House of Representatives; the Republicans pulled that bill. I think they pulled it because they're fearful that there will be enough Republicans who understand it's the right thing to do or understand that the voters expect them to do it, so that it would pass.

And apparently the overwhelming majority of Republicans and their leadership don't want to do what is fair, what is right for working men and women in this country who are working at the very lowest levels but who are making our country go. I hope they change their minds. We need to pass an increase in the minimum wage so that not 10 years will pass before we give consideration to those folks.

George Miller?

MILLER: Thank you very much. And I'm honored to join my colleagues.

You all know the issues surrounding the minimum wage. What we're reduced here today is to plead with three leaders of the Congress, Speaker Dennis Hastert, Majority Leader John Boehner and Majority Leader Bill Frist, and ask them in the name of simple decency and simple fairness and simple respect for America's families to increase the minimum wage.

MILLER: Think what it means to these families where you get up and you go to work every day, all day long, and at the end of the year you end up poor. And you've done it for nine years without an increase. And yet you're trying to provide health care for your children.

And you say, "Well, they have Medicaid." But the fact of the matter is, all of them are now being faced with deductibles, co- payments, all of the increases that we see in prescription drugs as the states cut back.

You're trying to provide an education and you're getting lectures from Dennis Hastert and Bill Frist and John Boehner that you have to save more for your retirement because they're going to privatize Social Security and take it away. You're getting the lecture that you have to provide your health care. You're getting the lecture that you have to provide your children's education and you have to contribute more.

And for nine years, you haven't gotten an increase. Who are these people to lecture these people about providing for their families when they won't make the basic law of this United States, the basic wage law of this United States, fair and decent for these families who go to work every day and end up poor? Who are these leaders in Congress to suggest that these people can do more on less?

As my colleagues have pointed out, each and every one of these years we've been provided a COLA. If they would have simply given these workers a COLA, it would have meant thousands and thousands of dollars to them over that nine-year period of time, which they could have provided for their families. They could have given their kids something extra.

They might have even been able to set a little bit aside. They certainly might have been able to meet the increased fuel cost or repair the car, because we know they travel greater distances by public transportation and older cars.

Everything works against these families. And yet they go to work every day, but we don't respect their work.

This Congress has got to change its course. It's got to go in a new direction. It's got to respect these families and their effort and what they do every day.

MILLER: And it's got to raise the minimum wage in the name of simple decency and fairness to the American public.

DURBIN: I'm glad to join my colleagues from both the House and the Senate in support of this increase in the minimum wage.

There was a time when this was not a political football. There was a time when presidents of both political parties considered this a moral obligation, to increase the minimum wage periodically, so people would keep up with the cost of living.

But unfortunately, over the last nine years, it's become extremely political. A Republican Congress and Republican president have said no repeatedly. It just strikes me as odd that the same party that wants to preach to us about values and family values obviously doesn't value the families that are working hard every day to try to keep their kids together and their family together under the worst possible circumstances.

These families need a helping hand. The cost of living continues to increase.

But we don't have time to deal with the minimum wage. See, we have to cut the estate tax. We have to spend our time eliminating the tax on the wealthiest people in America.

Our problem is clearly, from the Republican point of view, we are not spending enough time worrying about those who are so comfortable and so well off.

Well, frankly, I think we have an obligation in our society to consider those who are working hard, who are part of America and look for representation in this chamber, in the Senate and in the House.

They don't have well-paid lobbyists, that's for sure. They don't have them roaming the halls and attending our fund-raisers. But they're the people who make up America and have made it great. They are the ones who really believe this is a land of opportunity, but they want a chance, they want an opportunity with a decent wage.

In the nine years that we have failed to increase the minimum wage, we have not failed to increase the wage of members of Congress. It's gone up $31,000 in that same period of time. That is disgraceful. It is shameful.

I think we should be paid what we are worth -- that's for sure -- but we ought to pay these people what they are worth. And they're certainly worth a heck of a lot more than $5.15 an hour.

I'm going to support Senator Kennedy's effort in the Senate. I think $7.25 over two years is not unreasonable. It will give people about $4,400 more a year. It will give them perhaps an extra dollar to be spent on quality day care, so instead of leaving your child with that person next door you're not too sure of, you might be able to leave that baby with somebody you can really trust.

It'll mean being able to pay for some dental care, which today they can't pay for, or medical care or the basics of life which we all take for granted.

DURBIN: It's long overdue.

QUESTION: Senator Kennedy, what's your plan for getting this to a vote in the Senate? Have you decided when you're going to offer this?

KENNEDY: When I introduced the legislation yesterday, it was going to be on a second degree to the Nelson amendment. And I was going to file the cloture petition on it, which would have guaranteed that we would have had a vote on Wednesday.

The majority leader had indicated that he would give the assurance to those of us who are supporting increase in the minimum wage that we will get a vote on this prior to the time the cloture is enacted.

And at the present time, the two leaders are working out the time. There's some possibility that it will be this afternoon; I think more likely, probably, tomorrow morning.

We were given the Republican alternative about 35 minutes ago, five minutes before I came in here. Our increase in the minimum wage is effectively a page. It's on two pages, but it is one page long.

Their alternative is 70 pages. And 52 pages are tax cuts for various industries. And that is being reviewed now by the Finance Committee and by the Budget Committee.

We don't know whether the estate tax has been put in there or what else has been put in there. And it seems that we ought to have the report of the Budget Committee, of the Finance Committee, as to exactly what the implications and what the cost of their proposal would be, prior to the time that we vote on it.

But there's a guarantee that we will have a vote. I expect there will be an alternative by the Republicans that will be inadequate and will be highly costly in terms of the budget.

QUESTION: Does that mean that the Democrats would not be prepared to support it?

I mean, this same thing happened last year, as you recall, where there was a Republican alternative and the Republicans moved to defeat the Democratic version and the Democrats moved to defeat the Republican version.

Is that going to...

KENNEDY: Well, first of all, we're not really sure what's in it.

But it was completely inadequate. It was rather a cynical, desperate attempt, at that time, by Senator Santorum. I think people are, as I mentioned earlier, men and women of dignity. And I think they deserve more than a tin cup contribution, myself.

But we'll have a chance to review what it will be.

QUESTION: Senator, is there any scenario under which there could be a straight up or down vote, where you just need to get 51 to pass it, or is this guaranteed to be something where you need to get to 60? And can you get to 60?

KENNEDY: Well, it's a challenge to get to 60 votes. We have gotten that in the past. And when we have, if you look over the period in the '90s, we were able to get more than the 50 votes when the House of Representatives showed life, like they're showing now, where Republicans began to show some independence and to show that they were prepared to vote for an increase. And then, remarkably, Republicans in the Senate showed a willingness to get an increase, and we got an increase.

But the only way that we can get a vote is by running through the parliamentary gymnastics, which the Republican leadership require us to do, require us to do, and that requires that we'll have to get -- we'll get 60 votes. But we'll do everything that we can, and we've been in the low 50s. And it seems to me what has been happening in the countryside is that dramatic difference. That is what is influencing, I think, the House and the Senate.

When you have what has happened in Arkansas, the home of Wal-Mart moving. When you have what has happened in Florida, what's happened in Nevada, North Carolina. All across this country there's increasing action and increasing the minimum wage and in a great many cities the living wage, which is even significantly above this.

Just a final point on the living wage. What you're finding out in cities, and the clearest example was Baltimore, when they did that, the total cost of government went down because their workers were getting paid more, so they had less turnover, so it was less costly to train people. They had better attendance records. And they had a higher quality of productivity.

And so the whole total cost, even though they were paying people more, actually went down. Pretty good lesson that if you treat people decently and fairly, that they're going to perform their duties, and it's too bad that our Republican friends don't understand.

HOYER: I'd like to make a comment on that question, if I can, because that's going to be an issue in the House.

We added the amendment that I offered to the Labor-Health bill. It is, however, legislation on an appropriation bill, and have to be protected by a waiver in the rule.

We're going to make it very clear, and we hope you'll help us make it very clear, that the up-or-down vote to which you refer will be on the rule. Very clearly, if they do not protect the minimum wage, which passed 32-7, the increase by 70 cents, $2.10 over two and a half years, that will be the vote on whether or not a member is prepared to increase the minimum wage.

Senator Kennedy mentioned, I mentioned 81 percent. He mentioned Florida. Seventy-two percent of the voters in Florida went to the polls and voted to increase their minimum wage and to build in a cost-of-living escalator. There's no doubt that the overwhelming majority.

Twenty-one states have now got a minimum wage higher, set by a state, than we do at the federal level. There's no doubt the public's really behind this.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, one thing that has changed in the last nine years is that there have been a lot of very low-wage jobs created in places like China where the wages are way below the current U.S. minimum wage.

QUESTION: How does that fact change the terms in this debate? Does it affect this debate in any way?

CLINTON: I don't believe it does, in large measure because many of the minimum wage jobs that people take are jobs that can't be outsourced. You know, they're jobs that are here on the ground: taking care of people in nursing homes, serving people food in restaurants, cleaning up bathrooms in hotels.

I mean, these are jobs that are necessary for the economy and are very important to keeping the economy going.

The other point I would make, though, is: We have to do more to be competitive, to keep our jobs here. But we can't sacrifice our standard of living and the wages that enable Americans to lead decent lives and give their children better futures.

There is no evidence whatsoever by any of the economic studies that I've reviewed which suggests that this would be a job-killer for any reason, including the reason that you mentioned.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, you made your segway from some of the workers that you've referred to about how some of them are immigrant, some of them are illegal immigrants, and (OFF-MIKE) that would be your comment as well.

Speaker Hastert indicated today that the chairmen of relevant committees in the House would (OFF-MIKE) these field hearings. Essentially, as he says, it could be beyond the Senate bill.

Someone said this was a way to kill any sort of immigration bill this year, and getting to conference would be impossible, but you're doing it over the entire August recess.

I wonder what you make of Speaker Hastert's move to do this now.

CLINTON: Well, I should let my friends from the House answer that, because they know more about what's going on over there.

From my vantage point, it looks like another effort to score political points by refusing to do what needs to be done to deal with the problems we face in America.

You know, there's that old slogan: The won't-do Congress won't do. And this Congress sure won't do anything that's in the best interests of Americans, so far as I can tell.

And we passed a comprehensive bill over here and I think, rather than dealing with it, they want to try to score political points.

But you know, obviously the folks from the House can answer that.

HOYER: I think the Republican Party is deeply divided on what it wants to do with immigration. The House Republicans are deeply divided from the president of the United States, their president. The president disagrees, essentially, with a lot of Republicans in the Senate, as Senate Republicans disagree with the House Republicans.

HOYER: So they're deeply divided. So in my opinion, this is a device to try to put off the issue so that they don't highlight their divisions, number one.

Number two, this minimum wage is critical as it relates to that, because there's an assertion that, geez, Americans don't want a lot of these jobs. That fact is, Americans can't survive on the salaries that these jobs pay.

If we'd put the salaries up, if we'd give them a decent wage, then they could take these jobs and there wouldn't be as much incentive for people to come across our border.

KENNEDY: I think the action by the House of Representatives to reopen a series of hearings on comprehensive immigration reform is a cynical effort to delay or kill a comprehensive immigration bill.

This legislation that we had that passed the United States Senate had two and a half years of hearings. We had extensive debate on the floor of the United States Senate.

The House of Representatives is strongly in favor of a criminalization of all the undocumented in this country. They have passed legislation that overwhelmingly reflects that view, that every undocumented will effectively be a felon and any individual American or any group of Americans, any church, any nongovernmental agency that help and assist any of those who are undocumented will also be open to prosecution as assisting felons.

So that has been the attitude and the view of the House of Representatives. And I think many of us, in a bipartisan way, because there's a bipartisan effort. Senator McCain has been a remarkable leader. Lindsey Graham. Chuck Hagel. A whole series of Republicans have been remarkable leaders in getting a good bill through the United States Senate.

And we want to do what the Constitution says that we should do, and what I think the broad majority of Americans want us to do, and that is to sit down and work out an effective program that will reflect many of the ideas of President Bush, who is a strong supporter of a comprehensive approach, and will be in the best interests of the security of our country, by having strong border security, in fairness and assure appropriate kind of legal enforcement by our employers and also permit an adjustment of status with the penalties which have been outlined in the Senate bill.

Thanks very much.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 6/21/2006

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Larry, I think that the Democrats are doing the country a great service by having this debate. It's the Republicans who are all blindly following the president and refusing to ask questions, even conducting the most minimal kind of congressional oversight.

I'm very proud that the Democratic Party is once again listening to the concerns of the people and listening to the concerns of our men and women in uniform. We need a plan and we need a plan that will lead us to victory, both for our own benefit and for the benefit of the Iraqis.

KING: Senator Mikulski, would it be better if you all were uniform on that plan?

SEN. BARBARA MIKULSKI (D), MARYLAND: Larry, we are united. We're united on the goal that this is a year of transition so that the Iraqis can stand up, so that we can stand down.

We believe that the Iraqi people have now chosen a government, they're going to now form a government, and it's time then for us to have a phased way of withdrawing. So what we're united on is the goal. We're debating two different methodologies. But at least we're presenting ideas.

Where are the ideas of the Republicans? They say stay the course. There is no course. There is going to be a new strategy in Iraq. No, he goes and he has a stunt. Stunts and slogans are not a policy for bringing our troops back home and letting the Iraqis act like the sovereign people they want to be. So that's why we're the Democrats for change.

KING: Senator Murray?

SEN. PATTY MURRAY (D), WASHINGTON: I think what you hear Democrats doing on the floor of the United States Senate tonight is asking the questions that the American people are asking all of us.

When are we going to come home? What is the mission now? What is going to be the way we can declare success and bring it home? How are we going to find a winnable solution there? When is my husband or my wife or my son or my brother or my daughter finally going to come home and not get sent back again? We're asking those questions rather than the other side, which is merely saying, same thing that they did yesterday and two months ago and three years ago.

KING: And Senator Landrieu, that's better than united saying out now?

SEN. MARY LANDRIEU (D), LOUISIANA: Well, as we've expressed, the Democrats have a united plan for transition. But Larry, at home in Louisiana, where we're trying to rebuild the Gulf Coast, people are concerned about the cost of the war, now escalated to $4.5-to-7 billion a month. You know, people are saying how are we paying for it? What is the plan? And so you know, those are issues that are really...

KING: And aren't lives the most important?

LANDRIEU: Yes, lives are most important. You can't put a price tag on a life, but people are starting to say at home, where are our priorities in terms of domestic investments and supporting our troops in a real way, not in a war that has no course and no end?

KING: And where are you on all this, Senator Lincoln?

SEN. BLANCHE LINCOLN (D), ARKANSAS: I think these ladies have done it well in that we are united on a year of transition and that we can't just stay the course. The American people don't want us to just stay the course. They want some answers. They want some solid plans of what we're going to do and redeployment in moving forward.

KING: Senator Clinton?

MIKULSKI: I think the Iraqis don't want us to stay the course. The Iraqi foreign minister in the newspaper said we're ready for you to leave by 2008.

KING: Senator Clinton, were you shocked that you were booed the other day at some conclave by Democrats when you said...

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: ... We all get booed, Larry.

KING: But these were your people, Senator Clinton, booing you.

CLINTON: Well, Larry, sometimes my mother boos me. We have a party that truly reflects the range of opinions in America. And I like that because it's real, it's authentic. And I know that people disagree with me on whether we should set a time certain, a deadline.

But I think the overwhelming majority of Americans and certainly of Democrats are saying, you know, our party is asking the hard questions, and that's what needs to happen. This is the first time that I can recall, just looking at our history, where we've had a Congress that has been absolutely supine. They've not asked a question. They won't cross this president and vice president. They won't ask for answers. And it's very troubling to me because the Congress is supposed to be a check and balance on the executive. And boy, if there's ever been a president that needed a check and balance, it's this one. But it's not coming from the Republican majority.

KING: Where do you stand, Senator Cantwell?

SEN. MARIA CANTWELL (D), WASHINGTON: I think it's very important given the amount of resources the United States and the loss of life and the impact on our military, that the United States play a larger role in saying where is the international community?

I've called for a U.S. envoy. You know, we've had former President Clinton and former President Bush go around the globe raising funds for tsunami relief, for Katrina relief. I'm fine -- send them to the Middle East and ask the countries to pledge support for the new Iraqi government so it can stand up and we can bring our troops home.

KING: And what response have you had to that request?

CANTWELL: Well, I'm hoping that they will be aggressive about the $13.5 billion that's already been pledged to the Iraqi relief effort because reconstruction costs are the burden that the U.S. taxpayer is paying right now. We've had less oil, less water, less electricity than before the war. And it's time that we build international support with the ideas that the United States believes in and get the rest of the neighborhood in the Arab community to support the new Iraqi regime.

KING: We'll take a break. When we come back, we'll get to the checklist proposed today by these nine Democratic -- the nine Democratic women senators of the United States Senate. Don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLINTON: We need steady, smart leadership. And the only way we can begin to get that is to elect a Democratic Congress that can hold this administration accountable and ask the hard questions and chart the new course that we need.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

FEINSTEIN: It's time the Senate placed the health of Americans ahead of the views of a limited number of people who are far from mainstream America. So today we challenge the Republican Congress to pass the stem cell bill this summer.

(END VIDEO CLIP) KING: Before we move to the checklist proposed today, let's -- we have a few e-mails we're going to get to tonight, asked from our Web site.

We have an e-mail question from Marilyn of Naperville, Indiana. She asks, "Why aren't our representatives and senators screaming from the rooftops of the Capitol about the brutal and vicious killing of two brave, young soldiers in Iraq?" Senator Feinstein?

FEINSTEIN: Well, we are. Let there be no doubt about it. This is hard to understand, how people act this way, how they torture, how they brutalize. And I think that's one more reason why we have to really take a look at where we're going and how we define victory, because what we're doing increasingly is putting our military in the middle of what is a vicious sectarian dispute where people go out, pick out if you're Sunni you get shot in the middle of the head. If you're Shia, you get knifed in the back.

And this is going on to the tune where 90,000 families have left their own country for fear of bloodshed. And my greatest worry is that the American men and women in our service get caught in the middle of what is an internecine civil war.

KING: Senator Mikulski, was it your idea to do the -- you're the dean of this group, right?

MIKULSKI: I'm Coach Barb here.

KING: Was it your idea about doing this checklist?

MIKULSKI: Actually, Larry, it was all of our ideas. We talk a great deal every day in the United States Senate about our constituents, about the concerns they've brought to us. And we were really frustrated. And what we were frustrated about, that we've been in session for only 70 days.

Here it is June 21st, and we've been in session only 70 days, and nothing's gotten done. So we decided to be like women. Women have a checklist in order to get things done to keep our families on track. So we wanted a checklist to get the Congress back on track.

KING: And each one of you took one thing?

MIKULSKI: Yes. Mine's pensions. Debbie Stabenow is about jobs. Senator Feinstein is about stem cell research. And what we want to do is challenge the Republicans, first of all, to provide leadership, change the agenda. How about changing the tone, and then also changing the schedule? We've got 50 days left, and let's make colleges affordable, stabilize pensions. Let's get it done.

KING: Senator Stabenow, your bailiwick was keeping good jobs in America.

STABENOW: Absolutely.

KING: Everyone says they want to do that. How? STABENOW: Well, first of all, we want to export our products, not our jobs, in a global economy. And Larry, I think that we're really in a fight for a way of life in this country, and we've got two choices.

We can do what the Bush administration and the Republicans are saying, which is it's OK to be erased to the bottom with lower wages, more costs on healthcare and pensions, or we can do what we want to do, which is make it to the top.

And that means you enforce trade laws, you deal with healthcare and energy costs, and then you protect pensions and you race like crazy around education and innovation. People in Michigan know that. We know how to race to the top.

KING: Are you saying the opposition doesn't want that?

STABENOW: Well, you know, I sat through the president's latest State of the Union and didn't hear the word manufacturing once. Manufacturing built the middle class of this country. You can't have an economy without making things and growing things, which by the way, we do very well in Michigan.

And when you look at the fact that the middle class in this country are being squeezed on all sides and the choice they're being given is work for less, pay more for healthcare, pay more for gas, pay more -- you know, maybe lose your pension, that's not good enough, and we're here to say we're about making this a fight to the top.

KING: Senator Boxer, your area was protecting air, land, and water.

BOXER: Yes.

KING: Who's against that?

BOXER: Well, you'd be surprised. You know, I never thought I'd be nostalgic for Ronald Reagan, but he was far more of an environmentalist than we see with this administration. Let me be specific so it's not just vague.

Superfund -- you know what a Superfund site is? It's the most toxic waste sites, very dangerous chemicals. We have in our midst so many of these sites, dozens of these sites, all across our states, where the toxins are uncontrolled. Why? Because they haven't renewed the Superfund fee on the biggest polluters. They've forgotten about polluter pays. It's now on the backs of the taxpayers.

And they have slowed up cleanups to the point where under the Clinton administration -- yes, I'm extremely nostalgic for that -- they cleaned up 80 sites a year. They're cleaning up 40 sites a year, Larry, and they're leaving the most dangerous sites out of control, and it's harmful for our families.

KING: We'll move to all these checklists. The senators on this -- in this panel, at this -- looks like a hearing. Senators Cantwell, Clinton, Feinstein, and Stabenow are all up for re-election. Will you all support each other?

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Oh, yes.

(CROSSTALK)

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Oh, yes.

(CROSSTALK)

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Of course.

(CROSSTALK)

KING: So you'll campaign for her? And you'll campaign for her?

CLINTON: Absolutely.

MIKULSKI: And we're like NATO. An attack on one is an attack on everyone.

(LAUGHTER)

KING: And if Senator Clinton were to win and run for the presidency ...

CLINTON: Oh, let's get back to the checklist.

(LAUGHTER)

KING: This is just an if. Would you all support her?

CLINTON: Oh, come on, Larry.

(CROSSTALK)

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: She's terrific.

KING: Would you all support her?

CLINTON: Larry ...

LINCOLN: She wants us to take one step at a time and get it right.

CLINTON: That's right.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: We want to send her to New York first.

CLINTON: We want to focus on what we can get done in this Congress. And then we need to focus on our elections in November because, as you say, we're running for re-election.

(CROSSTALK)

KING: Just wanted to see who's there for you. We'll be right back with more of the checklist. You're watching -- and more e-mails too. You're watching LARRY KING LIVE. Don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

LANDRIEU: We need a new direction to keep our nation and our neighborhoods safe. And so we challenged this Republican Congress to put national preparedness on the agenda.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(SINGING)

KING: I like that. I think it plays. We have, before we move back to our checklist, an e-mail question, asked on our web site, from Cheryl in San Diego, who asks, ladies, who are your picks for strong presidential candidates that the Democrats and independents in the country can support? Do you have any favorites so far?

BOXER: I'd say this, any one of these women could be on the ticket. President, vice president, I'm not kidding. They could.

KING: Any one of you?

BOXER: Any one of these women.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: We love New Hampshire. We think Iowa's great.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Michigan's a swing state.

KING: How close are you, Senator Landrieu, I'm sorry, Senator Clinton, to a woman president?

LANDRIEU: I think very close, Larry. I think people are starting to see women the way we see ourselves, which is very strong and powerful leaders and able to lead in the public sector and the corporate sector. We most certainly lead in our homes and our neighborhoods and our schools. It really is a breakthrough in democracy. This is the greatest democracy in the world. It's not perfect, and it's getting better every day. And when women get their rightful place, that helps the whole country be stronger in the world as well.

KING: Senator Lincoln, can the Democrats take the Senate?

LINCOLN: I think they can. It's going to be difficult. We've got an uphill climb there. We've got to certainly maintain the four women here and keep their seats. And I think we will. But we'll have to have some gains in order to be able to retake the Senate.

KING: Senator ...

STABENOW: If I could just say.

KING: You may. STABENOW: We have two great women, Clara McCaskill and Amy Kobachar running in Minnesota and Missouri. And we'd sure love to make this 11 the next time on the show.

KING: How about the House, Senator Cantwell?

CANTWELL: Well, I think the House has got a lot of seats that are in play. And obviously, we're going to talk about this checklist because we think the priorities on here, making college education more affordable, the fact that this administration's budget for next year represents the largest cut to education in 26 years, when you talk to the students at home at Washington State University or University of Washington, they want affordable education. They want the doors open to education, not slammed shut.

KING: Senator Clinton, your area on the checklist was making America energy independent. Is that feasible?

CLINTON: Absolutely, it's feasible.

KING: Really?

CLINTON: Yes, it is, Larry. There are so many examples around the world where other countries have made a commitment to a clean energy, independent future. And we haven't done that.

KING: But we're a guzzling nation.

CLINTON: Well, that's right. But, we also don't have a federal legal framework that encourages people to make the right decisions and to get more effective transportation, more effective electricity generation and distribution. What I proposed today was a strategic energy fund where we really try to treat it like we did with the Apollo project, sending somebody to the moon.

Make it a national priority. Make the investments to do the research. It is absolutely feasible. But we don't hear that from our leadership in the White House or the Congress. And I think that's a great mistake because we need to be energy independent in order to enhance our national security and our, take care of our environment.

KING: Senator Murray, yours was protect America and our military families. Are you saying the administration is not doing that?

MURRAY: Look, I am telling you they are not. And I'm really concerned about this. Part of the cost of war is taking care of those men and women who go overseas in service and come home. I was in Iraq with Barbara Boxer a year ago. And boy, our troops looked us in the eye and said is our country going to be there when we get home? And now we're seeing the statistics.

We're seeing 2,000 people in waiting lines at the Seattle VA alone just to get in and get their first health care checkup. We're seeing unemployment for men and women who are 20 to 24, who have served in Iraq, three times the national average. We're seeing 18 months wait for benefits. What this is about is not putting the money and the resources into the VA, realistically, based on what we're asking our men and women to do. And that's just wrong and we want to change that.

KING: Are you saying the Republicans don't want to change that?

MURRAY: Time and time again our amendments have been voted down to put in place a realistic budget for the VA. In fact, we did put money in for the VA. It was stripped out in the middle of the night in a supplemental committee.

KING: What's the argument against it?

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: They say they have enough. They say we've increased it.

LANDRIEU: I'd like to just follow with Patty. Every time Patty makes that argument, which is very powerful and accurate, they say but we're spending more this year than we did last year, with veterans. That's not the answer to the question. The question is are you spending enough based on the increased number of veterans coming back? We're having record numbers of veterans return. With record number of wounded, with mental health issues. So it's not just spending more money. It's spending it wisely and well. Using all the new technologies that we have.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: And it's not right to then try to look at that increase and basically say, well, here's how we're going to solve it, we're going to increase the fees and payments by veterans into the health care system.

KING: Being in the minority, both in the Senate as a gender and as a party, do you feel frustrated?

FEINSTEIN: Oh, yes. That's an easy question. Oh, yes. You know, I mean, you spend your life in this particular pursuit, trying to help people, trying to be creative, and you come back here and you find virtually every program that helps individuals, that cleans up our environment, as Barbara says, that can make us more energy efficient, that can respond to the problems of the day, and make us a better-educated, competitive society, cut. And you see tax cut after tax cut after tax cut in the middle of a war, which means the only thing then you can cut are all of these programs. And that's where this administration is going.

And you know, we're faced with another potential tax cut at a time when you've got a war that's cost $370 billion between Afghanistan and Iraq, funded out of supplementals. You've got entitlement programs that have some problems in them. And rather than solve problems and protect vital programs, the administration says, well, we'll privatize Social Security. When 50 percent of Americans have no retirement or no pension with the exception of Social Security. That's the mentality.

KING: We'll be right back ...

MIKLULSKI: We're not frustrated because of our gender. That was kind of the way the question, you said you're a minority. We're frustrated not because of our gender, we're frustrated because the agenda.

KING: It's the agenda of the gender.

MIKULSKI: It's the agenda of the gender. That's why the checklist. They want to spend their time giving us votes on radical judges, constitutional amendments that aren't going to take us anywhere, or promote democracy. We want votes. We want debate on real issues, helping our veterans, helping our kids go to school.

KING: I'll get a break in. We'll come right back, I'll introduce the whole panel, reintroduce the whole panel and more of the checklist issues, as we discuss them with the nine Democratic women members of the United States Senate, the other gender of the agenda. I feel like I'm back in Brooklyn. Don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MIKULSKI: Every generation paves the way. That's our obligation. To create more opportunities for families, to work together to build a safer, stronger America.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: I like that.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: That was good.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Can you continue that?

KING: That could be it now. That could be the campaign theme. Checklist proposed today. Let's meet the nine senators who combined to propose them. They are Senator Barbara Boxer, third-term Democrat of California; Senator Maria Cantwell, first-term Democrat of Washington, who's running for re-election.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, first-term Democrat of New York, also running for re-election. Senator Dianne Feinstein, third-term Democrat of California, also running for re-election. Senator Mary Landrieu, second-term Democrat of Louisiana; Senator Blanche Lincoln, second term Democrat of Arkansas; Senator Barbara Mikulski, the dean, the fourth-term Democrat of Maryland. She is dean of the United States Senate Women.

Senator Patty Murray, third-term Democrat of Washington. And Senator Debbie Stabenow, the first-term Democrat of Michigan, who is also running for re-election.

Let's take Senator Cantwell's checklist. Make college affordable for all. How?

CANTWELL: Well, I went to school on a Pell Grant, Larry. And I have to tell you, I'm not sure I'd be in the United States Senate or have been a successful executive at a software company if I hadn't had access to affordable college education, made through help and support of somebody who needed financial assistance.

And right now, with the cuts in the Pell Grant program not keeping pace with the rate of inflation, the cost of education for families has gotten more expensive. So education's gone up 63 percent in costs. Family income's only gone up a few percent.

So what we want is we want to pass legislation to increase Pell Grants, make the college tax deduction permanent, and make an investment, even give G.I.'s more opportunity in making the G.I. Bill permanent for life, so that they can continue their education opportunities as well.

KING: So you're saying it's not possible for anybody who wants to go to college to go to college?

CANTWELL: It's certainly -- I don't think the person that was in my situation today would have as many opportunities. And really this is a time period in our country where education is the meal ticket to this new economy. We want to empower individuals to have opportunities and empower our economy.

KING: Senator Landrieu, yours was prepare for future disasters. Understanding how you got that.

LANDRIEU: Absolutely, Larry. I mean, we're struggling every day to stand up a city that was put under 15 to 20 feet of water because the federal levee system broke.

Now we had some obligations at the local level, but the federal system, because of underfunding over years and bad design, put a city underwater. We had two hurricanes -- Category 5 out in the Gulf hit us at three. But there's not a place in America with the cutbacks that the Republicans have put forward that's ready.

We've asked to stand up FEMA. It's a shell of what it once was. To put it at a cabinet-level, you know, department. But for the Republican Congress that doesn't really believe that federal government can be effective, they've left it anemic, dysfunctional, and people are suffering, 200,000 homes.

KING: Are you saying it's less ready?

LANDRIEU: We are less ready. The country is not ready based on the 9/11, which is five years ago. Katrina was 10 months ago. We're into the next hurricane season. What have we learned? There's not been one day of discussion on the Senate floor dedicated to getting our first responders, you know, stood up, getting a debate about FEMA. And so we've got America basically sitting ducks for some of these catastrophes that could hit. And we'd better get focused on home, on our cities and our suburban and rural areas to keep them safe.

KING: Why not, Senator Clinton? Why hasn't it been discussed?

CLINTON: Well, Larry, the Bush administration dismantled FEMA from what it was in the 1990s, when it really did work.

KING: Before Katrina?

CLINTON: Yes, yes. And it was a decision made, again, based on ideology as well as money. And we're paying a big price for it. They've also not made a serious commitment to our ports, to our borders, to our mass transit system.

Every expert, from the 9/11 Commission on, has said the same thing. We are not prepared, we are not spending the money in the way that would maximize preparedness. And what Senator Landrieu said today, which was so right, is let's get FEMA back to the professional agency it once was, staffed with people who knew what to do in emergencies.

I still think we need an independent Katrina commission. We don't really know everything that went wrong, and we don't have a list of recommendations about how to fix it.

KING: Was FEMA better when you were first lady?

CLINTON: Oh, there's no doubt, there's no doubt. Everyone agrees with that.

BOXER: Dianne and I could tell you the difference. James Lee Witt became a father figure in California. Dianne, do you remember?

FEINSTEIN: I do.

BOXER: And we were so fortunate to have him. And we can -- when you see your husband, say thank you from us again because James Lee Witt was right there for us and people knew they could get help. Businesses could rebuild. We made history by rebuilding roads so quickly that they came in under budget and ahead of schedule, because of the federal government working with our state.

FEINSTEIN: You know, I think one of the biggest boondoggles was when they took 22 agencies and combined them into a super department.

KING: Sounded good.

FEINSTEIN: And FEMA lost its cabinet status. Now, Mary, you've got a huge disaster, the largest disaster, I think, in our nation's history. And the very entity handling that disaster is removed from the White House and can't communicate directly with the White House.

KING: Senator Stabenow?

STABENOW: I was just going to add that in addition to FEMA, we saw the 9/11 Commission give failing grades for lack of preparedness for first responders, port security, chemical security, radios not working. When I went down to see New Orleans right after the disaster, I sat with somebody from the Michigan Coast Guard and the Michigan Army National Guard that was there helping.

I was very proud of them. I said do you have radios? Yes. Do they talk to each other? No. I said, well, how are you communicating when you're out in the boats? They said hand signals. 2006 in this country, in America we can do better than hand signals. I've offered an amendment three times to fully fund radio communications and the Republican majority has said no.

MURRAY: You know, this is why we're talking about we need change. These are real critical issues. It could be an earthquake in my state. It could be another terrorist attack. We want our country to be prepared, and we're not talking about that in the Senate today.

KING: Is this beyond liberal-conservative?

MURRAY: This is about a management issue of the United States Senate dealing with the issues that are critical to every American family that's not being done today.

KING: Let me get a break. We'll pick up on some of the other checklists and some of your e-mails as well. Don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BOXER: We challenge the Republican Congress to put the environment back on the agenda, to move forward on a comprehensive science-based bill to stabilize and reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CANTWELL: It is wrong to look for the extra savings and deficit reductions in the pockets of the poorest students in America. It's time to invest in the future of America, the next generation of leaders, so that they can help themselves and our economy excel.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: Before we move back to the checklist, another e-mail question. This from Mike in Houston, who asks, "Why aren't the Democrats challenging the King Kong deficit spending by Bush since he's been president and the Republicans have controlled Congress? Hasn't the national debt doubled in the last few years?" Who wants to grab that?

(CROSSTALK)

STABENOW: Well, as a member of the Budget Committee, I would just say when I came into the Budget Committee in 2001, we had the largest surpluses in the history of the country, and now we have the largest deficits.

We put forward at the very beginning with those surpluses a plan that said take a third of it for tax cuts, a third of it to pay down the debt, and a third of it to invest in our people in education, innovation and healthcare. If we had done that, we'd be in a very different situation than we are today.

(CROSSTALK)

BOXER: And Larry, you should tell your person that we did talk today about pay as you go spending because we think you want to spend money? Find a place to find that money. Cut that other program or figure out a way to pay for it, and that is part of our leadership's goal, is pay as you go budgeting, go back to that.

LANDRIEU: But Republicans have voted it down.

BOXER: Exactly, right.

LANDRIEU: Let me be clear about this. They've voted that down. And it's simple to the American people. If you want something, pay for it.

KING: And what was their argument?

LANDRIEU: OK, if you want a tax cut, pay for it. If you want a program, pay for it.

MIKULSKI: Their argument was ...

(CROSSTALK)

LANDRIEU: They said they don't want to pay for their tax cuts, they want to borrow money to give tax cuts. We say we're for tax cuts but let's find a way to pay for them.

KING: We still have to get the checklists of Senators Mikulski, Lincoln, and Feinstein. And so we'll get Senator -- let's take Senator Lincoln's now. Your part was called make small business healthcare affordable.

LINCOLN: Right. Well, Larry, 46 million Americans are uninsured right now. And the majority of those are in small businesses. We have an incredible example. Over 40 years the federal government has figured out that if they take all eight million of their federal employees and they pool them, they can give them greater choice at a lower cost.

So we're the recipients of a very good healthcare program. There's no reason why we can't use that model that's been tested for 40 years and offer that same kind of choice at a lower price to small businesses.

KING: Is healthcare a right?

LINCOLN: Healthcare is essential. It's essential for the quality of life for Americans. It's essential to our economy. Workers do better when they're healthy. The fact is, is when you've got small businesses where their employees are uninsured, what happens when they become Medicare age? They're more costly to the government because they haven't been getting healthcare. The key is, is to make sure that we're looking practically at how we can offer better choice at a lower cost to as many Americans as we possibly can. And through small businesses, we reach a tremendous amount. If we pool them together, we give them the same benefit we have and there's no reason they shouldn't get it.

KING: We'll get to two more items on the checklist and then some general questions when we come back.

And before we go to break, let's check in with Anderson Cooper in New York. We're in Washington tonight. And Anderson will host, of course, "A.C. 360" at the top of the hour. Cher tonight?

ANDERSON COOPER, CNN ANCHOR: Cher -- yes, Cher is on the program tonight, Larry, talking about Iraq and trying to raise money for Marines' helmets.

We also have some breaking news at the top of the hour, that al Qaeda number two man Ayman al-Zawahiri has a new videotape posted online. Our teams are literally analyzing the video right now. We've confirmed that it is new, and that is just about all we know. It is a fast-moving story. As I said, we hope to tell you more about it at the top of the hour.

We'll also have Senator John Kerry on the program tonight talking about his proposal for Iraq and what he says about the critics who say that he is dragging down the Democratic Party, causing greater divisions and leaving an opening for Republicans to accuse the Democrats of wanting to cut and run in Iraq.

All that and more, Larry, at the top of the hour.

KING: Thanks. That's "A.C. 360" at the top of the hour, 10:00 Eastern, 7:00 Pacific. And we'll be right back. Don't go away.

(MUSIC)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

LINCOLN: We believe that expanding coverage for small business will go a long way towards making sure that millions of Americans would have access to medical care. And we truly believe that providing that kind of security is worth fighting for.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: Before we move back to the checklist, Senator Clinton, Senator Kerry's going to be on the program "A.C. 360" following us. He's now describing Republican policy as lie and die, and a lot are saying that that's causing a rift in your party. Is it?

CLINTON: You know, Larry, we are debating one of the most important issues facing our country. And I'm really proud that the Democratic Party is having this debate. The Republicans are not saying anything.

KING: But is Kerry hurting it?

CLINTON: No. I think everybody has a strong opinion about what should be done, and that's more than can be said for the Republicans, who are blindly following the president.

KING: So you don't criticize Senator Kerry?

CLINTON: Absolutely not.

KING: Senator Boxer, we just learned from Anderson that a new video message from the number two figure in al Qaeda, Ayman al- Zawahiri, was posted on an Islamic Web site Wednesday evening. He claims to have recorded the message, which lasts three minutes and 44 seconds. We don't know what he says. What do you make of this? I wish we knew what he said.

BOXER: Well, it's going to be horrific, whatever he says. This is a group that has no respect for human life and no respect for people, for children, for families. It's -- they behead people. This is a group that's beyond the pale.

But this is the point. I think the reason so many of us feel strongly that we need to change what's going on in Iraq is, we need to free up some resources to get back to getting al Qaeda. You know, the other side keeps saying the war on terror is the war in Iraq. Not true. We all voted, every one of us, differently on the war in Iraq. Every one of us voted after 9/11 to go get Bin Laden. They haven't done it. They turned away. They did this other war. And a lot of us are saying, most of us are saying it's time to change and to begin redeploying and concentrating on getting this horrible man who is heading al Qaeda, second in line to bin Laden.

MURRAY: And it reminds us that we should be focused on the floor of the Senate on port security and rail security and getting our men and women who are protecting us what they need.

KING: Senator Mikulski, your checklist was safeguarding America's pensions. Are they in trouble?

MIKULSKI: They absolutely are. First of all, I think we can be proud of the women here that fought the privatization of Social Security. This was one more of those presidential gimmicks that we were able to stop because, you know, you need a guaranteed benefit, not a guaranteed gamble. And when you're old, you need to be able to rely on Social Security. He wanted to send it to the stock market. We say nobody who's old should have to rely on the bull of political promises or a bear market.

Now they want to come back with this budget bill, and buried in the fine print is, once more, an attempt to privatize Social Security. And we're ready to stand sentry and be able to fight it. Then for our private sector pensions we have legislation that will protect the taxpayer from companies dumping pensions and making them pay for it and also helping good-guy companies know the rules. This has been pending 180 days after it passed the Senate and the house. This is why they squandered time they squander opportunity, and they squander money.

KING: When we come back, we'll ask Senator Feinstein the last one of the checklists, about investing in life-saving science like stem cell. Just so you know, we did take a look at the Republicans a few weeks ago, and we plan on doing much more with both parties as we get more and more into this coming election season. And tomorrow night's special guest will be the Director of the FBI, Robert Mueller. And we'll be right back with more. Don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MURRAY: Caring for our veterans is not a Republican or a Democratic issue. It is an American issue. We call on this Congress to do the most patriotic thing we can do, fulfill our promise to care for America's veterans and military families.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

STABENOW: We need a new direction for American workers and American businesses. We challenge the Republican Congress to enact tax policies that stop the outsourcing of American jobs.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: One more checklist to cover. Senator Feinstein, before we get another e-mail in, investing in life-saving science. You're talking about stem cell?

FEINSTEIN: Well, this is stem cell. And this is the heartbreak for me. Eight years ago I introduced one of the first stem cell bills. Here we are eight years later with virtually no federally funded stem cell research. The president authorized 22 stem cell lines only. They are all contaminated with mouse feeder cells. The House has passed a bill which says that rejected embryos from IVF clinics can be used for stem cell research. You know Christopher Reeve. We all know Christopher Reeve.

No one in medicine has ever thought that a spinal cord, once severed, could be healed. Stem cell research offers that opportunity. Every one of us has had families with juvenile diabetics come in and plead for this. People with cancer, people with Alzheimer's, by the thousands. And I don't understand it. Not to allow federal research to go ahead sets this nation so far back and hurts people.

KING: Even if you pass, it you're not going to override a veto, are you?

FEINSTEIN: Well, look.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: We've got to try. FEINSTEIN: The point is you have to try in this. You know, we came here to fight for what we believe in, and one of the things we believe in is to use this great scientific medical know-how for human well-being and to see, you have Nancy Reagan, who writes and says please do this. We have a bipartisan bill to do it in the Senate. You have a House bill. All we need do is pass it, and the votes are there in the Senate to pass it.

KING: Let me get in one more e-mail. This is from Carol in Vancouver, British Columbia. And she asks, which of the senators present have seen the Al Gore documentary "An Inconvenient Truth," and what's their response to it? Who's seen it? Hillary?

CLINTON: I thought it was terrific. And you know, Al for years has been sounding the alarm on global climate change. And no one can sit through that movie and not be convinced that time is running out for us to take the action we need to control the emissions of carbon dioxide into the air. And that goes right along with what we're trying to do in energy. It goes hand in hand. So I think he's done a great service, not just to our country, but the world.

KING: Would you like him to run again?

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Here we go.

CLINTON: You're good, Larry.

KING: That's not going too far.

CLINTON: All roads lead to one question. I have a question for you. When the FBI director is here tomorrow, ask him if he agrees with cutting the homeland security money to New York City. Just ask him.

KING: That's one of the top things on the list, you're ticked about that.

CLINTON: I am so ticked about that.

MIKULSKI: He's cutting it for Baltimore too.

KING: Were you shocked about it?

CLINTON: I was shocked. But that's what, we wake up every day trying to figure out what this administration is up to.

KING: What answer did they give you on New York?

CLINTON: Oh, they gave us such a run-around. And they cut some places in California. The point is it shows we need a risk-based, threat-based way to distribute money. And they have to keep trying to move the piece around because they won't put enough money in it to begin with.

KING: Do you think it's political? CLINTON: I think part of it is political, absolutely. Part of it is their highest priority is tax cuts. And so it's more important to cut the taxes, you know, on billionaires than to make sure that we have sufficient resources to fend off a terrorist attack.

BOXER: Larry, getting back to global warming ...

KING: ... You've got 30 seconds.

BOXER: OK. President Bush tomorrow could say that all the new cars that the federal government buys have to be energy efficient. He doesn't have to see a law passed. He doesn't have to do anything but just do it, like our states are doing it, our cities are doing it. And we call on him to do it. It's easy, doesn't hurt anybody.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Leadership. Leadership.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Time for a change.

STABENOW: We're making those flex-fuel vehicles and bio-diesel and hybrids.

KING: In Michigan, right?

STABENOW: In Michigan. And we would welcome that. If the president said even just a half or a third of the fleets, the federal fleets will be hybrids and flex fuels and we'll make them in Michigan.

KING: We're out of time. Thank you all. Thank you Senators Boxer, Cantwell, Clinton, Feinstein, Landrieu, Lincoln, Mikulski, Murray, and Stabenow.

And tomorrow night the FBI director, Robert Mueller, and I will ask him that.

CLINTON: Thank you.

KING: And Friday night, when we're back in California, Regis Philbin. Right now as the clock turns toward 10:00 PM Eastern, I love to say that, and it's time for "AC 360" and Anderson Cooper.

REMARKS BY SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY) AT THE NEW DEMOCRAT NETWORK ANNUAL MEETING: "WHAT COMES NEXT: A NEW POLITICS FOR AMERICA", 6/23/2006

(Applause.)

SEN. CLINTON: Good morning. Good morning. Thank you, Simon. (Laughs.)

Oh, I just caught part of Simon's introduction, and he brought back a lot of memories because he did come to Little Rock in 1992 and work in the "war room," was a very important part of our rapid response and instrumental to that winning campaign. And I'm very grateful, not only for that work, Simon, but what you've done in the years since to be part of a broad-based movement to really define the Democratic Party's future.

And NDN has contributed to the dialogue in so many ways. Certainly the excellent work done on the Hispanic initiative has been very helpful, and -- (applause) -- yes, we should give a round of applause, because Simon and Sergio and their team were among the most focused in progressive politics, in certainly the Democratic Party, to say: Look, we have to do everything we can to encourage and empower Hispanic voters, to speak to them, to make sure that their views and interests are heard.

I also want to thank Simon and NDN for being part of the American Dream Initiative, which is another effort that brings together several of the organizations, think tanks that are now very focused on giving the Democratic Party and leaders in the public and the private sector ideas about what we can do to move our country in the right direction.

So it's great to be here this morning. It's not the first time I've spoken before an NDN conference, and I'm grateful for the invitation.

There's so much to talk about that it is hard to put into a reasonable speech length many of the issues that are at stake. And let me just make a couple of points, and then perhaps we'll have time for a few questions. I don't know. Is that electronically possible? Is that -- all right. Because I would love to hear also what's on your mind.

I want to start by saying that although unity is important, it is not the most important value. It is, I think, a tribute to the Democratic party at this moment in time that we are honestly and openly struggling with a lot of the difficult issues facing our country. We just finished a debate about the way forward in Iraq. It turned out not to be a debate between the parties because the other party has made a decision to blindly follow the president, to ask no questions, to raise no concerns. My friend Jane Harman here in the front row, who has been a leader in our party on national security issues, has been raising hard questions while her counterpart is basically just in the amen corner for the Bush administration.

So I think that the Democrats may have somewhat different views about how we succeed in Iraq, but we are together unified in fulfilling our constitutional responsibility to engage in a legitimate debate, to ask the difficult issues and to offer honorable, responsible positions.

So when people say, "Well, gee, the Democrats seem not to have a unified position, I can very straightforwardly say I'm proud of the debate that we're having. We are trying to fulfill our responsibilities, in contrast to our friends on the other side, who have abdicated theirs. (Applause.) I don't think there has ever been a time in American history where the Congress has been so supine, unwilling to hold hearings, to hold any administration official accountable, to do what Congresses historically have done.

Now, I'd be the first to say sometimes Congresses get carried away. (Laughter, applause.) But, you know, there are many other examples throughout our history where Congress has done what it's expected to do.

I mean, think of it. In the middle of World War II, Harry Truman is holding hearings, through something called the Truman Commission in the Congress, on war profiteering. A Democratic president is in the White House, we're in the middle of a global conflict of epic proportions, and Harry Truman and his colleagues are asking hard questions.

Or think back to the Vietnam War and Bill Fulbright. Again, Democratic president, overwhelming Democratic majority, and he's saying we have to hold hearings; we have to ask the people making the decisions and conducting this war to come before us and the American people and explain their position, justify their actions.

Unfortunately, in today's Congress that seems to have been erased from the history books. There is very little willingness to do what should be done in holding this administration accountable in any respect.

Later this afternoon my colleague Byron Dorgan, the chair of the Democratic Policy Committee, will hold a hearing -- not an authorized hearing, not an official hearing, but a hearing of the Democrats through the Democratic Policy Committee to discuss the prewar intelligence, something that the Republican Congress won't even examine, in terms of the uses to which it was put.

So I feel very proud to be a Democrat. You know, I am very grateful that -- (interrupted by applause) -- Democrats are doing what should be done in a democracy.

Secondly, the nine Democratic women senators have come together around what we call a Checklist for Change. I'm sure that this is a gender-related trait -- (laughter) -- but we make checklists about everything. (Laughter.) We make checklists of our checklists. And so the nine of us were talking one day and we said, you know, look at the priorities of our Republican majority, look at the issues they're bringing to the floor of the Senate. Look at how they're trying to inflame their base and appeal to a very small sector of the electorate in order to enhance their chances for electoral victory in November. And we thought maybe we should present our own Checklist for Change, legislation we believe should be brought before the Congress, that we know would have an effect on the lives of the people we represent.

So the other morning, at the Sewall-Belmont House, the home of the women's suffrage movement and the women's party in Washington, we held a press conference where each of us spoke for two minutes about an issue that we were championing and that we had introduced legislation about which we cannot get a hearing, we cannot get a vote because of the priorities of the Republican majority.

Now, on our Checklist for Change is safeguard America's pensions. We have pension legislation that came out of the Senate, it's tied up in the conference committee. It is aimed at, you know, rescuing private-sector pensions and the Pension Benefit Corporation. And we think this should come before the Senate.

We have a series of bills to try to keep good jobs in America, you know, to do more on training, to do more on building up our competitive edge, you know, to slow outsourcing.

My colleague Debbie Stabenow has legislation to create the role of a trade prosecutor because for those of us who believe in open and free markets, it's been disheartening to see how little attention to enforcement this administration has paid. And if we're going to have free and open markets, then people have to pay by -- play by the rules, and we want to begin to try to create that level playing field.

We also want to get back to the idea of making college affordable for all. This administration -- (applause) -- has cut college aid more dramatically than any modern administration, making it more difficult both for middle-income students and lower-income students and their families to afford to send a child to college and keep that child in college and have that child graduate within a reasonable period of time. And this legislation would reverse the cuts in student aid that have been the hallmark of the Bush administration.

We want to do a better job of protecting America and our military families. We don't think that this administration had done the job it should on homeland security. As a senator from New York, I think about this every single day. And it's been hard to justify the approach that the administration has taken toward home-land security. I hope that we're going to begin to come to our senses and have what the 9/11 commission recommended -- threat-based, risk-based funding -- but it's going to require debating it and moving forward with that priority on the Senate floor.

When it comes to our military families, we're trying to do more to give them the support they need. I did a hearing out on Long Island with my colleague Steve Israel last year, and we had military families testifying about how they were eligible for food stamps, how they were being harassed by creditors. We need to do more to make sure that they're taken care of when their loved one is in harm's way.

We also -- (applause) -- we want to debate how we deal with disasters. We're in the middle of another hurricane season, and we all know what a terrible, neglectful failure the Bush administration was in its response to Katrina. But has anything really changed? Now, I introduced legislation shortly after Katrina for a Katrina commission, modeled on the 9/11 commission, to get to the bottom of what caused the dysfunctional response. I've also introduced legislation to make FEMA independent again, the way it was during the Clinton administration with Cabinet-level stature. (Applause.) I introduced that back in September, and earlier this year, my colleague Trent Lott, who lost his home, came to me and said, "You know, I agree with you.

I believe FEMA should be independent again." So we have the Lott- Clinton bill. You know, let's debate that. Let's get FEMA out of the Department of Homeland Security, where it never should have been placed in the first place, and get back to a responsive FEMA that actually lives up to its name, that it knows something about emergencies and management, and it's staffed with people who have credentials and experience.

Now, I also think that one of the highest priorities we should be dealing with is to make America energy-independent. (Applause.) And I have put forth a detailed approach to doing that, the centerpiece of which is a strategic energy fund that would make not just a financial commitment to accelerating research and moving more technology to commercial applicability sooner, but would ask the oil companies to be part of the solution, not just part of the problem, by contributing to this strategic energy fund.

There are a lot of good ideas out there about how we raise efficiency standards for our automobiles, how we incentivize alternative clean energy, how we make electricity more reliable. There are so many good ideas.

But we are locked in a mind-set that this administration started from the very beginning with the vice president's energy task force, which puts up roadblocks to change. Instead of a superhighway to an energy-independent future, we've been on a lot of detours leading to nowhere. And this issue is important for our economy, for our security and for our environment.

We also have advocated legislation to make small business health care affordable. You know, it's one of the biggest problems I hear about as I travel through New York. How can small businesses afford health care? And we have legislation that is modeled on the Federal Employee Health Benefits Plan, which is a great plan if you're a federal employee, because all 8 (million) to 9 million of us are pooled together, and we get better rates, and we get choice. So the Democrats think we should provide the same kind of opportunity to employers and employees in small businesses.

We also think it's past time to invest in lifesaving science by bringing a stem cell bill to the floor of the Senate for debate and voting. (Applause.) The Congress -- the House passed a stem cell bill on a bipartisan basis. Our leadership -- the Republican leadership won't bring it to a vote, because it will pass.

And we are allowing this lifesaving science to move offshore. Other countries are making big investments. Some states are trying to make their own investments, but there is no substitute both for federal investments but, equally important, for federal rules and regulations.

You know it is not illegal in America, it is not a crime to clone a human being. We cannot get an honest debate about stem cells, which would prohibit the most offensive forms of research, because the White House and the Congress don't want to move forward on what a huge bipartisan majority of Americans believe we should be doing to move into this new scientific arena.

And finally, on our Democratic women's Checklist for Change is to protect our air, land and water from the assault of this administration day in and day out. (Applause.) Now, this is about, of course, global climate change. And if you haven't seen Vice President Gore's movie, please see it. It will give you even more ammunition when you're discussing this with your friends and colleagues. So this is about moving toward some system that the United States will be part of to deal with carbon dioxide. But it is also about acid rain, it is about mercury, it is about Superfund toxic waste sites -- it is about the full range of how we protect our air, our land and our water, and equally importantly, it is about looking at the health consequences of our failure to do so.

Many of us believe that if you look at the three causes of disease -- genetics, behavior and environment -- we're making progress in understanding genetics; we're getting around to putting out some very strong advice about behavior, from everything from taking soft drinks out of schools to having employers encourage employees to exercise more, but we're not yet focusing on the environmental connections and causation. And I believe that many chronic diseases have a strong environmental focus, a strong environmental cause.

So there's a lot we want to do. So when people say to me, what do the Democrats stand for, this is what we stand for. We have legislation. We could vote on this legislation, we could make progress starting tomorrow in dealing with these issues.

And there are, of course, many others, like fiscal responsibility and getting back to the policies of the 1990s where we actually balanced the budget and came up with a surplus and created an upsurge in economic prosperity, lifting more people out of poverty.

If you want to lift people out of poverty, look at what we did in the 1990s, where the Earned Income Tax Credit, where other kinds of assistance to people who wanted to work hard enabled them to move themselves and their children into the middle class.

So I think we've got a great agenda. Now what we need is a winning electoral strategy. We need to run campaigns that make it clear to the American people that we know what we would do if we have the honor to take back one or both houses of Congress in the '06 elections. I cannot stress strongly enough how important it is we stay committed to winning elections this November.

The other side knows what is at stake, and I think their game plan is obvious to any who choose to look. They're going to replay what they did in '02 and '04. You can hear it, you can see it. It was certainly evident on the floor when we were debating the way forward in Iraq, and you know, the Republicans were quick to point fingers and call names and attach labels and slogans. You know, they may not have a war policy, but they do have an electoral policy, and it is once again to engender fear and insecurity and to try to prevent people from thinking about what works and what the real threats are that we face and the most effective strategies for dealing with them.

But I'm optimistic because I think reality has finally caught up with the Republican majority and the White House, because you can only go so long denying the evidence in front of your eyes. You know, for years now I've said that the Bush administration wanted to turn Washington into an evidence-free zone, and if you have read a review or had the occasion to read Ron Suskind's new book, "The One Percent Doctrine," you will see that there is a lot of evidence to back up their dismissal and denial of evidence. They speak derisively of those of us who live in the reality-based world because they believe that they can reshape reality even if it has very little to do with the threats we face, the risks we confront, the challenges and opportunities we should be seizing.

So it's our job to get out there and make the case for a Democratic majority, make the case for the Democratic priorities that will affect the lives of the vast majority of Americans. If we make that case with the help of NDN and all of the organizations who are committed to seeing us back on the right track, I think we will be successful in November.

Thank you all very much. (Applause.)

Okay. We have questions! And would you, I guess, identify yourself? Is that what we should do, Simon? Okay. Yes, sir?

Q Mrs. Clinton, thank you very much. My name is Bart Akachella (ph). I think a lot of people here are very enthusiastic about new media tools, specifically blogging and the so-called netroots. Do you share that enthusiasm? And do you have any ideas about how we can harness the power of this new movement to the benefit of progressives?

SEN. CLINTON: I do share that enthusiasm. I think it's very exciting what is going on in the so-called blogosphere. Again, you know, Simon and NDN were among the very first to understand the potential and power of the new media.

You know, it is hard to predict how it's going to develop and unfold. I hope that we will be as effective on the progressive side of the ledger in promoting our ideas, our solutions, as the other side is in tearing everything we do down. You know, I saw a commentator on TV the other day who said that the Republicans love the bloggers because progressive bloggers beat up on each other and Democrats, and conservative bloggers beat up on Democrats and progressives. So it's sort of a win-win from their perspective.

I think that's part of the -- you know, just the ferment, the exchange of ideas, the excitement of how people feel about what's going on, the passion that so many have about the misplaced priorities and policies of this administration and the Republican majority. So I think it's terrific.

I am also a very strong supporter of net neutrality because I do believe net neutrality is -- (interrupted by applause) -- the best policy to ensure that the Internet remains a public square of idea exchange and idea promotion. We're going to have a big fight about that in the Senate, and I really hope that we'll be able to maintain the idea of net neutrality. And I know that many in the netroots and blogger community are work-ing very hard on that, and I hope that they can help us influence some of the votes we need to try to make that happen.

Yes?

Q Good morning.

SEN. CLINTON: Good morning.

Q George Marsuli (sp) with People for the American Way. You know, in spite of the progressives' his-toric association with the Hispanic community, many argue that sort of over the last 10 years, conservatives have done a much better job in engaging Hispanics towards the future.

What kind of recommendations do you make to progressive leaders and leaders of progressive organizations in terms of engaging a community they may have variable degrees of understanding about?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think that's an important question because it is, unfortunately, the case that the other side has been much more effective in outreach and organization. You know, they still don't capture the majority of votes in most cases, but they do have organized, well-funded outreach efforts.

We have to take it very seriously. We can't -- I don't think we can take any voter for granted, I don't care who the voter is. We have to fight to earn every single vote. And that's certainly what I've tried to do in my time in the Senate.

And I hope that we'll do three things. First, any group that is serious about expanding our base and having a new majority for a progressive Democratic agenda will get to know the Hispanic community. You know, don't operate on any misunderstandings or stereotypes. It's a very diverse community with very different points of view, and it's not some monolith that people can say, oh, well this is what we're going to do. And so get to know the diversity.

You know, I hope people will seek out leaders in the various aspects of the Hispanic community to help guide how we go about doing this. There are experts in the field, like Sergio and others, who have been taking the pulse of the community for a very long time. You know, let's listen to them more. Let's pay attention. You know, I don't think we did a very good job in the last campaign acting on the research and evidence we had about how to reach Hispanic voters from Florida to California. So there's some wisdom out there; we should be open to it.

And finally, we need to recognize that an agenda for Hispanic voters is an agenda for America. There's not some special, limited specific agenda with two or three things on it. You know, every person I know that -- you know, my friends, my constituents, you know, they're worried about all the things that are on our check-list, plus they're worried about immigration; plus they're worried about, you know, some of the policies that we are, unfortunately, pursuing with our neighbors to the south. I mean, they're interested in everything anybody else is interested in, plus some specific issues. So, you know, don't just talk about one or two issues, it's an American agenda. And so I think if we do that, we can begin to put together the approach that could lead to a better-organized effort.

So, thank you all very much. (Applause.)

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY) DELIVERS REMARKS TO THE NEW DEMOCRAT NETWORK CONFERENCE, 6/23/2006

CLINTON: Good morning. Good morning.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you, Simon.

(APPLAUSE)

I just caught part of Simon's introduction, and he brought back a lot of memories. Because he did come to Little Rock in 1992 and work in the war room; was a very important part of our rapid response and instrumental to that winning campaign.

And I'm very grateful not only for that work, Simon, but for what you've done in the years since to be part of a broad-based movement to really define the Democratic Party's future and in the end has contributed to the dialogue in so many ways.

Certainly, the excellent work done on the Hispanic initiative has been very helpful and...

(APPLAUSE)

... yes, we should give a round of applause, because...

(APPLAUSE)

... Simon and Sergio and their team were among the most focused in progressive politics, in certainly the Democratic Party, to say, "Look, we have to do everything we can to encourage and empower Hispanic voters, to speak to them, to make sure that their views and interests are heard."

So it's great to be here this morning. It's not the first time I've spoken before an NDN conference. And I'm grateful for the invitation.

There's so much to talk about that it is hard to put into a reasonable speech length many of the issues that are at stake.

CLINTON: And let me just make a couple of points, and then perhaps we'll have time for a few questions.

You know, they may not have a war policy, but they do have an electoral policy. And it is once again to engender fear and insecurity and to try to prevent people from thinking about what works and what the real threats are that we face and the most effective strategies for dealing with them.

But I'm optimistic because I think reality has finally caught up with the Republican majority in the White House, because you can only go so long denying the evidence in front of your eyes.

CLINTON: You know, for years now I've said that the Bush administration wanted to turn Washington into an evidence-free zone. And if you have read a review or had the occasion to read Ron Suskind's new book, "The One Percent Doctrine," you will see that there is a lot of evidence to back up their dismissal and denial of evidence.

They speak derisively of those who live in the reality-based world, because they believe that they can reshape reality, even if it has very little to do with the threats we face, the risks we confront, the challenges and opportunities we should be seizing.

So it's our job to get out there and make the case for a Democratic majority, make the case for the Democratic priorities that will affect the lives of the vast majority of Americans.

If we make that case, with the help of NDN and all of the organizations who are committed to seeing us back on the right track, I think we will be successful in November.

Thank you all very much.

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: I think a lot of people here are very enthusiastic about new media tools, specifically blogging and the so-called net (inaudible). Do you share that enthusiasm, and do you have any ideas about how we can harness the power of this new movement to the benefit of progressives?

CLINTON: I do share that enthusiasm. I think it's very exciting what is going on in the so-called blogosphere.

Again, you know, Simon and NDN were among the very first to understand the potential and power of the new media.

CLINTON: You know, it is hard to predict how it's going to develop and unfold. I hope that we will be as effective on the progressive side of the ledger in promoting our ideas, our solutions as the other side in tearing everything we do down.

You know, I saw a commentator on TV the other day who said that the Republicans love the bloggers because progressive bloggers beat up on each other and Democrats and conservative bloggers beat up on Democrats and progressives. So it's sort of a win-win from their perspective.

I think that's part of just the ferment, the exchange of ideas, the excitement of how people feel about what's going on, the passion that so many have about the misplaced priorities and policies of this administration and the Republican majority.

So I think it's terrific.

I am also a very strong supporter of net neutrality, because I do believe net neutrality is...

(APPLAUSE)

... the best policy to ensure that the Internet remains a public square of idea exchange and idea promotion.

We're going to have a big fight about that in the Senate, and I really hope that we'll be able to maintain the idea of net neutrality. And I know that many in the net routes and blogger community are working very hard on that, and I hope that they can help us influence some of the votes we need to try to make that happen.

QUESTION: In spite of the progressives' historic association with the Hispanic community, many argue that sort of in the last 10 years, conservatives have done a much better job in engaging Hispanics toward the future.

What kind of recommendations do you make to progressive leaders and leaders of progressive organizations in terms of engaging a community that they may have variable degrees of understanding about?

CLINTON: I think that's an important question, because it is unfortunately the case that the other side has been much more effective in outreach and organization. They still don't capture the majority of votes in most cases, but they do have organized, well- funded outreach efforts.

We have to take it very seriously.

CLINTON: I don't think we can take any voter for granted. I don't care who the voter is. We have to fight to earn every single vote. And that's certainly what I try to do in my time in the Senate.

And I hope that we'll do three things. First, any group that is serious about expanding our base and having a new majority for a progressive Democratic agenda will get to know the Hispanic community. Don't operate on any misunderstandings or stereotypes.

(APPLAUSE)

It's a very diverse community with very different points of view, and it's not some monolith that people can say, oh, well, this is what we're going to do.

And so, get to know the diversity. I hope people will seek out leaders in the various aspects of the Hispanic community to help guide how we go about doing this.

There are experts in the field, like Sergio and others, who have been taking the pulse of the community for a very long time. Let's listen to them more. Let's pay attention.

I don't think we did a very good job in the last campaign acting on the research and evidence we had about how to reach Hispanic voters from Florida to California.

So there's some wisdom out there. We should be open to it.

And finally, we need to recognize that an agenda for Hispanic voters is an agenda for America. There's not some special limited specific agenda with two or three things on it.

(APPLAUSE)

Every person I know -- my friends, my constituents, they're worried about all the things that are on our checklist, plus they're worried about immigration, plus they're worried about some of the policies that we are unfortunately pursuing with our neighbors to the south.

They're interested in everything anybody else is interested in, plus some specific issues.

So don't just talk about one or two issues. It's an American agenda.

And so I think if we do that, we can begin to put together the approach that could lead to a better organized effort.

So thank you all very much.

DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF THE SENATE HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON THE MINIMUM WAGE, 6/27/2006

CLINTON: Harry, thank you very much.

You know, several months ago it became clear that this Congress, which will not put the needs of the American people first, was more than willing to put their own needs first. And we've seen in the House action to increase the incomes of members of Congress.

I was very impressed when a Web site, the Sliced Bread Web site, came up with an idea that wasn't mine, it was somebody who thought about this and submitted it and said, "You know, why on Earth should members of Congress get a raise when they won't raise the minimum wage?"

So I've introduced legislation several months ago to link congressional pay raises with a minimum wage increase.

Once again last week, we saw this won't-do Congress putting its own interests ahead of hardworking Americans. And it's very sad that we have to be here talking about this.

CLINTON: We should have raised the minimum wage some time in the last nine years. We haven't. But we have raised the pay of members of Congress significantly over that same period.

So my legislation, which Senator Kennedy has co-sponsored, would make it very clear we're not going to raise congressional pay until we raise the minimum wage of the people who get up every day and work hard for a living and can't get themselves and their children out of poverty.

DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF THE SENATE HOLD A NEWS TELECONFERENCE ON THE RELEASE OF THE STUDENT DEBT REPORT, 6/28/2006

CLINTON: Oh, I'm here, Ted.

KENNEDY: OK, good.

CLINTON: I want to thank you, first and foremost, for your leadership on this for so many years. And the reason this call is so timely and the report and the Student Debt Relief Act is that, last December, the Republican leadership decided to impose one of the largest hikes in student loan interest rates in history.

And when, this weekend, on Saturday, July 1, the interest rate paid by college students and their parents will rise by two percent or more, we're sending out a last-minute alarm here so that student borrowers and their parents can look into consolidating their loans.

If they do it this week, they may be able to lock in a lower interest rate than they would pay starting Saturday.

CLINTON: And we will do everything we can with our legislation to try to remedy the problems that my col-leagues have so ably described, which is really at the root of undermining the American dream for so many worthy students and imposing unbelievable costs on them and their families.

So I just hope that families will try to lock in a lower rate now and then support the Democratic efforts in the Senate to try to pass legislation that will get us back on the right track, to make sure that students have access to information. I have been pushing a student borrower bill of rights so that people aren't subject to bait and switch, and that they know what the interest rates are, they know what's expected of them.

But, more importantly, it's that we can get back on a track where the majority of students who want to go to college are not going to have to have overwhelming, crushing debt burdens or, as is happening too often today, decide they just can't afford to be part of the best future for themselves and our country.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON THE FUTURE OF MILITARY COMMISSIONS, 7/13/2006

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And thanks especially to this panel. I commend you all for your years of service and for your deep concern about the issues that we're discussing today. And I certainly look forward to your continuing guidance.

I hope that you will be -- those of you still in uniform -- actively involved and permitted in the consultation process going forward so that we try to work this out on a bipartisan, bicameral basis, certainly for the good of our men and women in uniform and, frankly, for the good of our country.

I think that there's been so much confusion about this issue -- the way it's been discussed, the way it's been, to some extent, sensationalized. And I appreciate the very sober and prudent way you've addressed these matters.

Some of you have talked about looking to the Nuremberg trials and even the other international tribunals that have been established over the last 50 years as examples as we move forward and try to determine what best course to take.

CLINTON: Do any of you have specific lessons that you think we should draw, either to apply or not apply from those international experiences?

HUTSON: I would say accountability, coming out of Nuremberg.

CLINTON: Accountability up and down the chain of command?

HUTSON: Accountability up and down the chain of command, that people are responsible for the actions of their subordinates and so that, when you're trying bin Laden, he's responding as Yamashita.

I mean, I think that's one of the lessons that came out of World War II -- and that following illegal orders isn't a defense.

CLINTON: Can there be legal orders when you have a terrorist organization?

Is there such a thing as a baseline of legality?

I mean, I think those are the kinds of questions people have to ask. I mean, this is different than what we've attempted to do before. And I think looking to the international tribunals could be enlightening.

Anyone else have anything to add about that?

Yes, General?

SANDKUHLER: Well, Senator, you could look at -- we've looked at some of the ideas of discovery that exist under the Rwandan, Yugoslav international criminal courts, that have procedures that recognize the need for classified information or security documents of interest to the other nations, being controlled in a way that is not perhaps revealed to an accused.

So there are items out there from those fora that we think we can look at, and we have looked at in the past, that provide us with criteria that are internationally acceptable.

CLINTON: Well, we've had two examples, one here with the Moussaoui trial, one in Germany, where the refusal of our government to share information arguably affected the outcomes of those trials.

So I think this question about confidential evidence and hearsay evidence is going to be especially thorny.

You know, one of the concerns that I have is that, as you look at the evidence that could be presented, a lot of it will be hearsay or confidential, classified in some form or another.

CLINTON: May I ask if you've given thought, as I'm sure you have, that you could share with us about the understanding of the specific issue of confidentiality as a precedent in war crimes tribunals. Would the rules in the Classified Information Procedures Act be sufficient?

And on the issue of hearsay and the challenges of obtaining evidence from continents away, from battlefields that are 8,000 feet in the air, how do you address that? Does anybody have any initial impression that you'd be willing to share with us on confidentiality and hearsay?

HUTSON: Senator, Military Rule of Evidence 505 deals quite nicely with classified sources and means kinds of things where there's a variety of ways -- in camera and showing it to the judge in camera, unclassified summaries, and that sort of thing -- that can be used as, again, a starting point or baseline for dealing with that aspect of your question.

With regard to hearsay, of course you're absolutely right. There's going to be lots of hearsay problems if you were to just use the military rules with regard to hearsay, which are basically the same as the federal rules.

I would suggest that you need to have some sort of apparent authenticity and maybe corroborating evidence aspect to it, so that what you can't do, I think, is say to the accused, "We know you're guilty. We can't tell you why. But there's a guy, we can't tell you who, who told us something; we can't tell you what. But you're guilty."

CLINTON: But I also want to reinforce something that one of you just said, and that is: We're not talking about a choice between trying somebody or letting somebody go. I think that's been very confusing to people in this process. And there's been a lot of hyped rhetoric about, you know, you're going to tear down this system; look what the Supreme Court did: we're going to let all these terrorists loose.

You do not have to let people go. I mean, these are enemy combatants, prisoners of war, whatever we want to call them. I mean, we had Nazis in prison camps in our country for years. And then the hostilities ended and they were let go.

So I think it's useful not only to be talking about the details as to what we need to consider going forward, but maybe to clear the air a little bit -- because I listened to some of the hearings that some of you participated in yesterday and, frankly, it was embarrassing.

GRAHAM: Would the senator yield?

CLINTON: I certainly would, Mr. Chairman.

GRAHAM: Isn't it correct that you could be acquitted in a military commission and still be held as an enemy combatant even if you're acquitted?

(UNKNOWN): That's correct, sir.

GRAHAM: Go to your point: You're absolutely right.

CLINTON: Well, thank you for that clarification and addition.

I just want to be sure, Mr. Chairman, that as we got forward with this, that the Senate does not engage in the same kind of heated, inaccurate rhetoric that will undermine this very important, serious endeavor.

And, therefore, we need to clarify many of the points. And that is one of the critical ones that I wanted to get on the record, because this is not about whether you try terrorists or let them go.

And I think we have to be very clear about that going forward.

WARNER: I thank the senator from New York for that very insightful observation.

Senator Sessions?

U.S. SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE (R-OK) HOLDS A HEARING ON EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS AND RESPONSE SYSTEM AS RELATED TO THE STAFFORD ACT, 7/27/2006

CLINTON: Thank you so much, Mr. Chairman, and thank you for your leadership on this. It's a pleasure working with you on such an important issue.

I will ask unanimous consent that my entire opening statement be made a part of the record.

I want to just highlight a few points. We're quickly moving toward the fifth anniversary of the attacks of 9/11 and I have personally met with many individuals who have been severely impacted by both their physical and mental health conditions due to what they were subjected to during the attack and in the days, weeks and months after. People who were first responders, who bravely rushed in. People who were construction workers. People who were sanitation workers. People who worked in the streets to get the telecommunications back up so the stock exchange could open. People who were transportation workers. So many people who were there for months on end as well as other workers and residents of downtown New York.

And I have called for and welcome both the creation of the current World Trade Center Worker Health Monitoring Program and the efforts of Dr. John Howard, director of NIAH (ph) in his capacity as the federal coordinator for 9/11 health.

The federal government, however, has no plan to deal with this long-term health crisis. In fact, the "Daily News" in New York published a series of stories on these individuals and about what they have suffered from, the kind of impact it's having upon people who can no longer perform their duties as firefighters or police officers because of the diseases that have materialized, the decreased breathing capacity and other ailments that have emerged since 9/11.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that these stories from the "Daily News" be made a part of the record.

You know, Mr. Chairman, I don't think we know whether Hurricane Katrina will have long-term health impacts. Some researchers are looking into that. But I think we should pay special attention to long-term medical and mental health needs. They should be tracked, monitored and treated after significant natural or manmade disasters. I hope that we can look into that issue on this panel.

I've also been working with my colleague, Senator Voinovich, because his state sent some first responders to Ground Zero. They came home and began suffering from health effects. So this is a problem directly related to the experience that so many people had trying to cope with this overwhelming disaster.

I also am concerned about Hurricane Katrina, the subsequent failed response that we've unfortunately been living with now for nearly a year, but we just experienced significant floods in upstate New York and, as a result, you know, tens of thousands of people lost their homes, lost their businesses. In Queens, we're experiencing a massive blackout. Con Ed can't figure out what caused it. They've had a horrible time trying to figure out how to fix it. We have seen so many businesses destroyed, particularly food related businesses.

And as I travel around, I just feel that we're not prepared to respond to all of these problems and, you know, I think that because each of the problems I mentioned have national implications, whether it's our electricity grid or the impact on our oil supply out of the Gulf or whatever it might be, we need to take a hard look at what kind of federal assistance should be available. And the Stafford Act is our key to doing that.

And, finally, I hope we can address the lessons learned from Katrina. I have a stack of reports here, almost too heavy for me to life. They've been conducted by the House, the Senate, the GAO, the White House, independent experts. After Hurricane Katrina I advocated for a single, independent commission, modeled after the 9/11 Commission, because I think we have to learn these lessons. You know, there is a tremendous amount of wisdom in what went wrong as well as what went right.

I met with the Red Cross the other day and they were very candid in telling me what they thought went right and what went wrong. But we have this disparate reports. I hope that we can figure out how to really zero in on lessons learned. I mean, one of the reasons that the chairman and I have supported trying to go back to an independent FEMA is that when everybody is in charge, nobody is in charge. When disaster preparedness and response is lodged in a gigantic bureaucracy, it is easy to get lost, particularly when that bureaucracy was formed after 9/11 to deal with the incredibly dangerous problem of terrorist attacks.

So, if the Stafford Act authorities need to be changed, clarified, expanded or even contracted, I hope we'll have the courage to make those changes. And I think everyone knows the chairman is a pretty determined leader, and I really trust that we'll get to the bottom of this and really make some of the changes that we need.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think you can tell from both our statements and our questions that we have a lot of concern. I would list a number of those, for me: long-term health monitoring and treatment; the types of assistance that are available, low interest loans versus grants, which in some situations I think may be called for; large-scale long-term housing after disasters; registering numbers of individuals for assistance for reconciling families, for doing that; as well as to try to get a better system to avoid the waste that we've now been hearing about, the billions of dollars wasted, trailers rotting in a field near the Hope Airport in South Arkansas; debris removal, which has been referenced; and no bid contracts.

I mean, those are all areas of deep concern to me. And I would ask, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity to submit additional questions in writing to try to elicit further information from these agencies.

INHOFE: Without objection. And I might also add that several other members who are not here will be submitting questions for the record.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Let me ask you, Mr. Shea, what FEMA's attitude is toward creating some kind of long-term recovery entity, either within FEMA, but given the constraints you face, I understand why that may be difficult, or at least coordinated by FEMA so that localities and states that are overwhelmed, as we have seen with 9/11 and then with Katrina, could immediately setup some kind of medical, mental health tracking and treatment protocol.

Senator Voinovich and I have introduced the Disaster Area Health and Environmental Monitoring Act, which would amend the Stafford Act to allow the president to setup monitoring programs in order to protect and track the health of first responders and residents, with a priority on tracking first responders with high degrees of exposure to known toxic substances.

Do you believe that this is an additional both responsibility and opportunity for our disaster response mechanism?

SHEA: Senator, I guess my comment would kind of read as follows on that. I know that under your leadership, that we began looking very hard at some issues surrounding the implications of 9/11, and I think, frankly, part of the experience, we've been involved in that now for well over a year and it's been a beneficial experience, no question about it.

One of the things that is a little unnerving is that there are no conclusions to it, and so we're still struggling with that, but we do believe that the health and safety aspects of the Stafford Act are really significant and are ready to address them should we know what the issues are to be addressed. And so that's one of the constraints on us at this moment, I think.

CLINTON: Well, that's an area that I would like to work with you further. And I appreciate the fact that we did get Mr. Howard appointed to do the work that he's now doing, and I think that's going to be also very informational.

I wanted to ask General Riley, you know, debris cleanup has been identified as a real holdup. I talked with Mayor Nagin from New Orleans on Monday and asked him how the Lower 9th Ward was going, because I was there in December. He said not much has happened. And there are other places within Louisiana and Mississippi where you get the same response.

I am very concerned about this and wonder, general, if you think we need to make some changes in the Stafford Act or the National Response Plan Agency activities in order to do a better job of getting on the stick with this and getting it done more efficiently.

RILEY: Yes, Senator. There is clearly in the 9th Ward a challenge. And mainly the challenge has been -- well, very quickly the Corps was able, under FEMA's mission assignment, to move and clear the rights of way, and that happened very quickly.

What the challenge was then was the slow return of residents. As residents return, they'll put more debris out in the right of way, so we'll go clean that up fairly quickly.

The real challenge in 9th Ward and other areas that were heavily damaged was obtaining the right of entry signed by the resident and the bank and the mortgage company and through the state and FEMA and the community before it got to us. So, the only thing that the Stafford Act could do, I would think, would be take away personal rights of their property. So I would hate to see that.

It's a very deliberate procedure, but it's all in the interest of protecting personal property rights. So we don't just go on their property -- now, if there is a tree that's about to damage public property, we can go onto private property and take care of that, but in any other instance we defer to their personal property rights and get a signed right of entry before we enter on that private property, to demolish a structure, for instance.

CLINTON: Well, General, I think that sounds real good, but what I've heard, both from New Orleans and from some of the surrounding parishes, is that there were a lot of contracts that were giving to independent debris removal companies and they haven't done the job either. So, I mean, it's like, you're not doing the job because you can't get permission, but everybody I've talked to says they've been waiting desperately now for months to get somebody to come remove their debris.

So, I mean, I think we're kind of in a circular position here, and it doesn't add up to me, and as part of our review I think it would be appropriate, Mr. Chairman, to ask the Army Corps and FEMA for a breakdown of the debris removal contracts let during Hurricane Katrina, you know, who got them, what the dollar amounts were, who the prime contractors subcontracted out of, because what I've been hearing from people is that the money has just been dissipated. It went to some prime contractor who subcontracted to somebody else who subcontracted to his brother-in-law, subcontracted to, you know, his uncle, and by the time it got down to the person who was supposed to go haul the debris away, there was hardly any money left.

So I think we need to look into this, because it may be that we want to recommend, you know, pre-positioning material and having contracts already on the ready and having qualified people who can perform this function at a cost effective rate that saves the taxpayers dollars.

So I'm not -- I'm certainly far from satisfied that this is an area that we've done a particularly good job in. In fact, I think we've failed miserably in many instances, and I think we can do better. So, I think, Mr. Chairman, this is one place we need to emphasize.

INHOFE: You know, Senator Clinton, what you might do at this point is go ahead and direct that question to one of the witnesses for the record with a response and find out. I think it's a good idea.

CLINTON: I would like to ask both General Riley and Mr. Shea to provide us with information about the contracts that were let with respect to debris removal after Katrina. Will you do that, General?

RILEY: Yes, Senator, I sure will.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Mr. Shea?

SHEA: We will.

CLINTON: Thank you, sir.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you.

I certainly agree with that. Catastrophic events are by definition different, and we need a plan to deal with that.

I wanted to ask all three of you. During the 1990s, we had close coordination with state and local government through Project Impact. Now we have the Disaster Mitigation Act which, based on your testimony, we're not really yet fully understanding, implementing, making sense of.

Let me ask each of you, starting with you, Ms. Little, do we need to restore Project Impact as a model for how to coordinate better at the state, local and federal level?

LITTLE: Senator Clinton, I'm not sure that it matters that it's exactly Project Impact, but certainly both pre- and post-disaster mitigation are very important to reducing ultimate government cost for disaster.

If states can be allowed this enhanced roll of managing, then there will be close coordination, not only with state and local government, but also with the private sector, which is very important. As long as the private sector and the citizens are also invested in mitigation opportunities at the funding that they have put in and with the funding that the federal government has to put in, then it can be a complimented and coordinated effort in that regard.

So, I'm not sure that it matters that you call it Project Impact, but both post-disaster and pre-disaster mitigation are vitally important.

CLINTON: And do each of you agree with that, Ms. Pogue and Mr. Mascelli?

POGUE: I think the greatest value of Project Impact -- I was a state coordinator for Project Impact in Rhode Island, most outstanding state one year -- was the link with the private sector and the business community. It's all about disaster resilient communities, and a community is not going to become disaster resilient or sustainable unless you look at the economic impact on that community, and the greatest value to Project Impact, and I can speak on behalf of the state of Hawaii and the state of Rhode Island, is that we had a direct connection with our state economic development division, our realtors, our chambers of commerce and our local private business people. And that, more than anything else, and a lot of fantastic things came out of Project Impact, but that to me is what is missing now, is a direct connect with the business community, and they took on the responsibility of dealing with what happens when and what happens if, and preparing for that.

CLINTON: I would just underscore that. And you agree with that too, Mr. Mascelli?

MASCELLI: I agree, that in the sense that whatever we call it and whatever it is...

CLINTON: It doesn't matter what we call it.

MASCELLI: It doesn't matter. I think it's the right attention given where mitigation is actually producing the results we need it to produce.

CLINTON: Well, I've been visiting with lots of businesses, obviously, in the last five years, since 9/11, and it is surprising to me how desperate they are to get good information. You know, big shopping center owners, other large business interests, some of the companies that run recreational facilities, entertainment venues. They don't know where to go anymore, and they've been knocking on a lot of doors. And, frankly, the doors aren't opening up for them. So I think this is an area of great importance going forward.

Ms. Pogue, I wanted to ask you, you know, we've now had 18 months of severe flooding in upstate New York. We've had two 100-year floods and one 300-year flood, and it has been devastating, because most of the communities up there, along the Susquehanna, along the Delaware, you know, the Mohawk, they are small, rural communities, beautiful communities, and some of those areas had 30-year-old flood maps. They didn't have any idea of how best to protect themselves. And the first flood came, and they scrambled for help and, frankly, didn't get a lot of help from the federal government. The second flood came, and they haven't even recovered, and now we've had this horrible third, 300- year flood.

So what else can we do to try to provide communities with updated and accurate floodplain maps and data and then coordinate them so they're better prepared in facing these disasters, Ms. Pogue?

POGUE: I think primarily what you're addressing or what you're asking is great, because in Rhode Island we're having the same situation. It's about risk communication. And as you probably know, the FEMA Mapping and Modernization Program, which has been underway for about three years or so, will be updating all of the flood insurance rate maps throughout the country.

New York, as a matter of fact, has one of the more aggressive, proactive programs, which has been tremendous. And so I think that, and the concerns that you're addressing, I completely emphasize with, because Rhode Island brags about the fact that our flood maps are probably some of the oldest in the country. So I can completely understand what you're saying, and we too are going to be updating all of our flood maps.

I think in addition to updating those flood maps, so people will be better aware of where the risks more accurate are, it's getting into public education and outreach. Our governor has basically undertaken an initiative to get the word out, because people do not understand flood insurance. They do not understand how to protect themselves. There is incredible misinformation out there. And so we are actively, actively working with FEMA, which by the way has a tremendous program called Flood Smart, that gets the word out, that helps business owners as well as people who rent, who, by the way, don't know they can buy flood insurance, as well as people who own homes. How they can buy flood insurance, where they can buy it and what the coverage does entail.

So I think they need to understand the risks, which with the flood mapping program is going to happen, and then they need to understand what they can do about addressing that risk.

CLINTON: Can I ask just one more question, Mr. Chairman?

I am concerned about planning and coordination for mass evacuations. We have seen the National Hurricane Center predicting severe hurricanes for this year and for the foreseeable future, not only in the Gulf but along the East Coast, and there is a particular concern about New York City and Long Island.

In fact, the "National Geographic," when they did their special on Katrina, at the very back of the magazine, there was a chart about where the next disastrous, catastrophic flooding from hurricanes, and New York City and Long Island were at the top of the list.

Given our experience in Katrina and all of the confusion, given the fact that I just read that the state is still arguing with DHS about who is responsible for what in terms of evacuation, you know, who has to do the planning, I mean, this is really troubling to me.

Could each of you comment briefly about how we could better coordinate and expedite the planning for mass evacuations and, you know, what role the federal government, through DHS and FEMA could play in trying to help get us organized to do this. Do you have any comments on that, Mr. Mascelli?

MASCELLI: Yes, ma'am.

It's a very significant issue, and I think that right now the way that we have it structured is, evacuation tends to be a local issue. Local county, local municipality, then goes to the state, federal government. Per se, has not been involved in to a great degree evacuation planning.

But I think the reality is, again, looking at our demographics, look where we have people now living. We're becoming more urbanized across the country, and living in coastal areas, et cetera, that the evacuations that we saw last year of the Houston area and New Orleans, et cetera, are our future, and clearly those evacuation activities far exceed the local municipal capacity, county capacity, in most cases state capacity.

So it would seem that evacuations, particularly these big operations, are really a national issue. Therefore, we should involve the national government, the federal government, in terms of how we get at these things. Big issue. We're going to be dealing with it for a while.

CLINTON: Ms. Pogue?

POGUE: I just completed the statewide hurricane evacuation routing system for Rhode Island, and I'll tell you what came out of that. We had 210 meetings with our communities. We worked with the federal government, meaning the National Weather Service, and the Army Corps. We took the coastal inundation and flood maps and storm surge maps.

The result is we have for the first time a digital geo-reference evacuation routing system for the entire state, and what it meant was not just meeting with individual communities, but also meeting with them in regions and getting them to coordinate amongst one another. So, we literally have from top to bottom, all 39 miles, we have a coordinated approach to what is going to happen and where they're going to evacuate.

And so it can be a mass evacuation or just one particular community within Rhode Island. And as a result of that, the folks have bought into that. They know where they're supposed to go. Because we have a heavy tourism season in August and September as well, but that took meeting with communities.

And I've got to be honest with you, in terms of the federal government, you know, as a state emergency manager, I think it's on us. I worked with the DOT very, very close and with our cities and towns, so they now know that it's their responsibility. They know where they have to be. We have pre-position points that are going to be traffic choke points. We have a detailed, with, quite frankly, federal highway money, so that was a federal initiative there. They just did an analysis of what we came up with and we basically were 100 percent right on.

So I think it's, like debris management, it's preplanning. You need to plan now in order to be able to deal with it then.

CLINTON: And Ms. Little?

LITTLE: Senator Clinton, likewise in Ohio, we were one of the states that accepted evacuees and were pre-pared to accept evacuees from the Gulf Coast states during Katrina. We found that our partnership with our volunteer agencies and many other private businesses in Ohio was far more than we knew, and I think just the fact of having gone through that once and now learning together, we coordinated very closely with our regional office in Chicago, FEMA regional office, and with our volunteer organizations and several private businesses that stepped up very quickly. And I think as we plan together, we've got to coordinate it not only with state and local government but with private business and our very fine volunteer partners.

CLINTON: Well, thank you so much, and thank you for this panel, Mr. Chairman, and I guess I would just conclude by saying, you know, to me it is, you know, it's going to happen at the site. People have to take responsibility for themselves. But I think we've learned that the federal government has to drive this pro-cess, and when it doesn't, when it gets distracted or diverted or whatever happens, you know, a lot of places are left on their own without the expertise, without the experience, and, you know, frankly, that then comes back to cost us all money, and we have loss of life and loss of property that we could have avoided.

So, I think that again there are some things we can do, and clearly the chairman and I think we can do it bet-ter than we're doing it, and we're going to keep pushing to try to make that happen. But I thank each of you for your years and years of experience. It's a wonderful panel to hear from. Thank you.

INHOFE: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

It's the policy of the committee to leave the record open for a week and then we have several senators, in-cluding Senator Vitter, who has questions that will be submitted for the record.

I appreciate your patience very much, for your staying here, and we are adjourned.

DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF THE SENATE HOLD A NEWS CONFER-ENCE ON THE MINIMUM WAGE, 8/2/2006

CLINTON: Well, I want to thank my colleagues but, particularly, I want to thank everyone here today who's part of this national effort to do the right thing.

CLINTON: We haven't had a minimum wage increase in nearly 10 years, and certainly hardworking people like Janelle (ph) feel it in their pocketbooks. With the cost of gas going up, with the cost of health care going up, with the cost of everything going up, that minimum wage buys less and less every single day.

So we've been trying, under Senator Kennedy's leadership, to do the right thing and raise the minimum wage. We finally ran out of patience. And Senator Kennedy and I introduced legislation a few months ago which linked a raise in the minimum wage to the congressional salary increase, which has happened just like clockwork over the last nine years.

The difference is, I think, startling. You know, if you work 40 hours a week, 52 weeks a year, you'll bring home about $10,700. And that's below the poverty line.

In the comparable time since it's been that we last saw a minimum wage increase, Congress has raised its salary by nearly three times that amount. And that's on top of an already generous salary, far above what most Americans make.

So we've said, "No more congressional pay increases until we raise the minimum wage." And so what happens?

Well, the House sends over this package of deceptive bait-and-switch, kind of, legislation and expects the Senate to roll over. And that's not going to happen.

This is bad for America. You know, there are things in that package of bills that every one of us would sign on to. But we're not going to sign on to a deceptive minimum wage that would actually lower the incomes of thousands and thousands of workers in states across our country.

CLINTON: So we're standing firm and we are proud to have so many allies standing with us.

And it's now my pleasure to introduce Sister Simone Campbell. She's the national coordinator of NETWORK, which is a Catholic social justice organization.

Sister?

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And welcome, General Gonzales, Secretary England.

Secretary England, I appreciate very much your being here because I think it is important, and I assume you agree, to have our civilian leadership testify before this committee.

ENGLAND: Yes, I do.

CLINTON: Secretary England, I'm not sure you are aware, but the leadership of this committee, Chairman Warner, formally invited Secretary Rumsfeld to appear before us at an open hearing tomorrow, alongside General Pace and General Abizaid, because of the pressing importance of the issue to be discussed; namely, Iraq, Afghanistan, the Middle East, our country's policies affecting each of those areas.

Unfortunately, Secretary Rumsfeld has declined to do so. He has instead opted to appear only in private settings.

I understand yesterday he appeared behind closed doors with the Republican senators. I'm told tomorrow he will be appearing again behind closed doors with all senators.

But I'm concerned, Mr. Secretary, because I think that this committee, and the American public, deserve to hear from the secretary of defense.

We are going to be out in our states for the recess. Obviously, these matters are much on the minds of our constituents. And I would appreciate your conveying the concern that I, and certainly the leadership which invited the secretary to be here, have with his inability to schedule an appearance before this committee to discuss the most important issues facing our country.

CLINTON: I appreciate your agreement that it is important to have our civilian leadership appear. And obviously we will look forward to having our military leadership tomorrow. But I think it's hard to understand why the secretary would not appear in public before this committee, answer our questions, answer the questions that are on the minds of our constituents.

WARNER: If you would yield, Senator, on my time, not to take away from yours?

You're accurate. Senator Levin and I did, as we customarily do, wrote the secretary, as well as the chairman of the Joint Chiefs and General Abizaid. The secretary made a special effort to get General Abizaid over here such that he could appear before the committee.

It was the intention of myself as chairman that tomorrow's very important hearing focus on the military operations being conducted in Iraq and Afghanistan and the impact of other military operations by other countries in the theater of Israel, Lebanon and Palestine.

I discussed with the secretary, and at no time did he refuse to come up here. I simply had to coordinate this with the leadership of the Senate -- most importantly, my leader -- and he felt it would be desirable for the whole Senate to have a panel consisting of the secretaries of state, defense, chairman Joint Chiefs, and General Abizaid. And given that option, the decision was made that we would do that one as opposed to both, given the secretary's schedule.

So I do not detract that from your time.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the explanation.

I think it is abundantly clear, however, to the members of this committee, as it is to countless Americans that the secretary has been a very involved manager in the military decision-making that has gone on in the last five years. And in fact, in recent publications, there's quite a great deal of detail as to the secretary's decision-making -- one might even say interference, second guessing, overruling the military leadership of our country.

CLINTON: And I, for one, am deeply disturbed at the failures, the constant, consistent failures of strategy with respect to Iraq, Afghanistan, and elsewhere. And I don't think that those failures can be appropriately attributed to our military leadership.

So, although the secretary finds time to address the Republican senators, although he finds time to address us behind closed doors, I think the American people deserve to see the principal decision-maker when it comes to these matters that are putting our young men and women at risk.

More than 2,500 of them have lost their lives. And this secretary of defense, I think, owes the American people more than he is providing.

So I appreciate the invitation that you extended, as is your want. You worked very hard, I know, to create the environment in which we would have the opportunity to question the secretary. Unfortunately, he chose only to make himself available to us behind closed doors, out of view of the public, the press, our constituents, our military and their families. And I think that is unfortunate.

WARNER: I would only add that we have under consideration a press conference following his appearance before the senators tomorrow. And, further, we have under discussion, as soon as the Senate returns in September, an overall hearing on many of the issues which the distinguished senator from New York raises.

CLINTON: I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

CLINTON: Attorney General Gonzales, I want to follow up on the line of questioning from Senator McCain, because I'm, frankly, confused.

You have testified with respect to Common Article 3, and I think we have clarified that perhaps your statement was not fully understood because you stated the U.S. military had never before been in a conflict in which it applied Common Article 3 as the governing detention standard.

You acknowledge, however, that we have frequently applied the higher standard of the Geneva Conventions to regular and lawful combatants who are captured as prisoners of war. And, in fact, you agree with the JAGs who appear before us that that is the standard that our military trains to.

Now, why not, then, apply the higher standard? Why go seeking another standard? Apply the standard to which we are already training our troops, rather than trying to come up with a different, perhaps even lower standard, that would provide for less protective treatment of detainees.

GONZALES: Senator, that is certainly a policy decision that one could adopt. The court, however, did not say that all of the protections of Geneva applied to our conflict with Al Qaida. The court simply said that Common Article 3 applies to our conflict with Al Qaida.

And that's the problem, or issue, or challenge that's been created as a result of the Hamdan decision. And that's what we're trying to do in this legislation, is trying to address that particular issue that's been created as a result of that decision.

CLINTON: Well, do you anticipate that the legislation will include United States citizens as enemy combatants?

GONZALES: No, ma'am.

First of all, with respect to the procedures under military commission order 1, there was never any question that it would not apply to trials of American citizens. And I can say with confidence there is agreement within the administration that the commission procedures that we would have Congress consider would not relate to American citizens.

CLINTON: Now I know that we keep coming back to this distinction that seems to be at the heart of the disagreement over the treatment of these people, what ever we call them.

And some in the administration, as I understand it, have argued that there should be a distinction between unlawful enemy combatants, those who act in violation of the laws and customs of war, and so-called lawful enemy combatants who might be, for example, full members of the regular armed forces of a state party.

How do those categories, the lawful enemy combat, differ from what is commonly known as prisoners of war? Is there a difference between a lawful enemy combatant and a prisoner of war?

GONZALES: Yes, Senator, there is a difference. I think if you're a prisoner of war, you get all the protections under the Geneva Conventions that we normally think of with respect to the Geneva Convention.

And our soldiers are entitled to those protections because they fight according to the laws of war, they carry weapons openly, they wear a uniform, they operate under a command structure.

And so they would be entitled to all of the protections under the Geneva Convention.

GONZALES: But the Geneva Convention is a treaty between state parties. And, for example, the president made a determination that in our conflict with Al Qaida the requirements of the Geneva Conventions would not apply because Al Qaida is not a signatory party to the Geneva Convention, and therefore they would not be entitled to all of the protections of the Geneva Convention. However, the president made a decision that, nonetheless, they would be treated humanely, consistent with the principles of the Geneva Convention.

The president also made a determination that with respect to the Taliban, they were -- Afghanistan was a signatory to the Geneva Convention. However, because they did not fight according to the requirements of the Geneva Convention, that they, too, would not be afforded the protections of prisoners of war under the Geneva Convention.

CLINTON: Well, then, just to finish, you would then make the argument that during the Vietnam War we would have treated a north Vietnamese prisoner different from a Viet Cong prisoner?

GONZALES: I probably don't know -- I'd hesitate to answer that question. It's conceivable, given their status. My recollection about the governing or ruling government in that country makes it difficult for me to answer that question, but it's conceivable, yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON IRAQ, AFGHANISTAN AND COUNTERTERRORISM MEASURES, 8/3/2006

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Senator McCain.

Mr. Secretary, we're glad you're here.

In your opening statement, you reference the common sense of Americans. Well, I think it's fair to say that that collective common sense overwhelmingly does not either understand or approve of the way you and the administration are handling Iraq and Afghanistan.

Under your leadership, there have been numerous errors in judgment that have led us to where we are in Iraq and Afghanistan. We have a full-fledged insurgency and full-blown sectarian conflict in Iraq.

Now, whether you label it a civil war or not, it certainly has created a situation of extreme violence and the continuing loss of life among our troops and of the Iraqis.

You did not go into Iraq with enough troops to establish law and order.

CLINTON: You disbanded the entire Iraqi army. Now, we're trying to recreate it.

You did not do enough planning for what is called Phase Four and rejected all the planning that had been done previously to maintain stability after the regime was overthrown.

You underestimated the nature and strength of the insurgency, the sectarian violence and the spread of Iranian influence.

Last year, Congress passed the United States Policy in Iraq Act, which I strongly supported. This law declares 2006 to be a year of significant transition to full Iraqi sovereignty, with Iraqi security forces taking the lead for the security of a free and sovereign Iraq, thereby creating the conditions for the phased redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq.

However, we appear to be moving in the opposite direction, with the number of U.S. troops in Iraq scheduled to increase, not decrease. That's the only way I think you can fairly consider the decision with respect to the 172nd Stryker Brigade.

So, Mr. Secretary, as we returned to our states for the August recess, our constituents have a lot of questions and concerns about the current state of affairs in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

I don't need to remind any of us that we continue to lose our young men and women: 120 from New York alone.

Beside the U.S. losses, violence does seem to be increasing. From January to June of this year, there were 14,338 Iraqi civilian casualties, at least as far as anyone can count; in May and June alone, more than 5,000 deaths and 5,700 injuries.

In a July 22 article in the New York Times, General Abizaid was quoted as saying, "Two months after the new Iraqi government took office, the security gains that we had hoped for had not been achieved."

Then there was the big, ballyhooed announcement of Forward Together and the commitment by the new Iraqi government to secure Baghdad.

CLINTON: Two months into that, it's clear it's not working and we are now putting in more American troops and -- following the lead of Senator McCain's line of questioning -- removing them from other places that are hardly stable and secure.

In Afghanistan, your administration's credibility is also suspect. In December 2002, you said, "The Taliban are gone." In September 2004, President Bush said, "The Taliban no longer is in existence."

However, this February, DIA Director Lieutenant General Maples said that, in 2005, attacks by the Taliban and other anti-coalition forces were up 20 percent from 2004 levels, and these insurgents were a greater threat to the Afghan government's efforts to expand its authority than in any time since 2001.

Further, General Eikenberry made a comparable comment with respect to the dangers that are now going on in Afghanistan and the failure to be able to secure it.

Obviously, I could go on and on. A recent book, aptly titled "Fiasco," describes in some detail the decision-making apparatus that has led us to this situation.

So, Mr. Secretary, when our constituents ask for evidence that your policy in Iraq and Afghanistan will be successful, you don't leave us with much to talk about. Yes, we hear a lot of happy talk and rosy scenarios, but because of the administration's strategic blunders and, frankly, the record of incompetence in executing, you are presiding over a failed policy.

Given your track record, Secretary Rumsfeld, why should we believe your assurances now?

RUMSFELD: My goodness.

First, I tried to make notes and to follow the prepared statement you've presented.

First of all, it's true: There is sectarian conflict in Iraq and there is a loss of life.

RUMSFELD: And it's an unfortunate and tragic thing that that's taking place.

And it is true that there are people who are attempting to prevent that government from being successful. And they are the people who are blowing up buildings and killing innocent men, women and children, and taking off the heads of people on television. And the idea of their prevailing is unacceptable.

Second, you said the number of troops were wrong. I guess history will make a judgment on that. The number of troops that went in and the number of troops that were there every month since and the number of troops that are there today reflected the best judgment of the military commanders on the ground, their superiors, General Pace, General Abizaid, the civilian leadership of the Department of Defense and the president of the United States.

I think it's not correct to assume that they were wrong numbers. And I don't think the evidence suggests that, and it will be interesting to see what history decides.

The balance between having too many and contributing to an insurgency by the feeling of occupation and the risk of having too few and having the security situation not be sufficient for the political progress to go forward is a complicated set of decisions. And I don't know that there's any guidebook that tells you how to do it. There's no rule book. There's no history for this.

And the judgments that have been made have been made by exceedingly well-trained people: the gentleman sitting next to me, the people on the ground in Iraq. They were studied and examined and analyzed by the civilian leadership and by the president, and they were confirmed. And so I think your assertion is, at least, debatable.

The idea that the army was disbanded, I think, is one that's, kind of, flying around. My impression is that to a great extent that army disbanded itself. Our forces came in so fast -- it was made up of a lot of Shia conscripts who didn't want to be in it and thousands -- or at least many, many hundreds -- of Sunni generals who weren't about to hang around after Saddam Hussein and his sons and administration were replaced.

The work to build a new army has included an awful lot of people from the prior army, and it has benefited from that.

Third, the assertion that the government rejected all the planning that had been done before is just simply false; that's not the case. The planning that had been done before was taken into account by the people who were executing the post-major combat operations activities.

The comments about Baghdad I'll possibly let General Abizaid comment on.

RUMSFELD: The goal is not to have U.S. forces do the heavy lifting in Baghdad. There are many, many more Iraqi forces in Baghdad.

The role of the U.S. forces is to help them, to provide logistics, to assist them as needed, and to create a presence that will allow the Iraqi security forces to succeed, and then, as our forces step back, allow the Iraqi security forces to be sufficient to maintain order in the city.

I can't predict if it will work this time. It may or it may not.

It happens to represent the best judgment of General Casey, General Chiarelli and the military leadership. And General Abizaid and General Pace and I have reviewed it. And we think that it is a sensible approach, as General Abizaid testified earlier.

Afghanistan -- I don't know who said what about whether the Taliban are gone, but, in fact, the Taliban that were running Afghanistan and ruling Afghanistan were replaced. And they were replaced by an election that took place in that country. And in terms of a government, or governing entity, they were gone. And that's a fact.

Are there still Taliban around? You bet.

Are they occupying safe havens in Afghanistan and other places -- correction -- in Pakistan and other places? Certainly they are.

Is the violence up? Yes.

Does the violence tend to be up during the summer and spring, summer and fall months? Yes, it does. And it tends to decline during the winter period.

Does that represent failed policy? I don't know. I would say not. I think you've got an awful lot of very talented people engaged in this. And the decisions that are being made are being made with great care after a great deal of consideration.

Are there setbacks? Yes.

Are there things that people can't anticipate? Yes.

Does the enemy have a brain and continue to make adjustments on the ground, requiring our forces to continue to make adjustments? You bet.

Is that going to continue to be the case? I think so.

Is this problem going to get solved in the near term about this long struggle against violent extremism? No, I don't believe it is, I think it's going to take some time.

And I know the question was, some wars lasted three years, some wars lasted four years, some wars lasted five years. The Cold War lasted 40-plus years.

And the struggle against violent extremists who are determined to prevent free people from exercising their rights as free people is going to go on a long time, and it's going to be a tough one.

That does not mean that we have to spend the rest of our lives, as the United States armed forces, in Iraq. The Iraqis are going to have to take that over. We can't want freedom more for the Iraqi people than they want for themselves. And Senator Thune mentioned earlier about that issue.

And I would point out the number of tips that have been coming from Iraqi people have been going up steadily. They're at a very high level. And it does suggest to me that the Iraqi people do want to have a free country, as I mentioned, because of their voting pattern.

So I would disagree strongly with your statement.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Secretary, I know you would, and I know you feel strongly about it, but there's a track record here. This is not 2002, 2003, 2004, '5, when you appeared before this committee and made many comments and presented many assurances that have, frankly, proven to be unfulfilled. And...

RUMSFELD: Senator, I don't think that's true. I have never painted a rosy picture. I've been very measured in my words. And you'd have a dickens of a time trying to find instances where I've been excessively optimistic. I understand this is tough stuff.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like unanimous consent to submit for the record a number of the secretary's former comments. And also, may we keep the record open for additional questions?

WARNER: The record will remain open until the close of business today for all members to contribute additional questions.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

"ABC Nightline," ABC, 9/7/2006

(Off-camera) Good evening. I'm Cynthia McFadden. Hillary Rodham Clinton is, according to the polls, one of the most polarizing figures in American public life. But love her or not, everybody, it seems, is interested in her. For one of the world's most prominent women, she is notoriously careful around the press, rarely letting her guard down. But last week, she agreed to let us follow her for a day of campaigning. While the election events we attended were clearly orchestrated by her staff to show her in the best possible light, we saw a lot. As (inaudible) might say, by just watching. We begin in Geneva, New York.

GRAPHICS: MAP OF GENEVA, NEW YORK

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Hi, Cynthia. How are you?

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Good morning.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

How are you?

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) How are you?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

I'm excellent.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) It's 9:00 in the morning. We'll later find out this is the last time we'll be on schedule all day.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Now, how's your son?

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) He's great. Thank you for remembering.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Good. Is he in school in New York?

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Yeah. Second grade.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Second grade.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) I'm supposed to be asking the questions.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Well, you know, we haven't talked for a long time. We have all day.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Well, it's my turn. Do you actually like it? Do you like campaigning?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

I love it. I absolutely love it. You know, I've done it for so many years, obviously, for Bill, but for a lot of other, you know, candidates around the country. For, you know, all kinds of offices. And when I started seven years ago, in July of '99, I really wasn't sure that I would like it for me.

(Off-camera) Right.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

I like saying, 'Please vote for Cynthia because, you know, et cetera, et cetera.' But to stand up and say, please vote for me. That was hard. And for months, my friends kept saying, 'You gotta stop saying we. You have to start saying I and me.' And it took a while. And anybody who followed, sort of the rocky trajectory of, you know, my getting out there on my own knows that I had to work really hard.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) They want us to take a walk.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) We've arranged for the Senator's staff to take walk in the garden.

CLINTON STAFF MEMBER (FEMALE)

Can we take some tea with us?

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) You're not allowed to have breakfast. No.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Bill has all these rules of politics, which I now understand completely.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Which are?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

One is, when you're, you know, it's time to go when you start having fun.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) You know, a lot of people look to Upstate New York and wonder whether Upstate New York is like the red states.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Certainly here in Upstate New York, people, you know, they wanna see you up close and personal. It's very much like my experience in Arkansas.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) What is that about? I mean, people literally wanna shake your hand.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Absolutely. And look in your eye and kind of gauge who you are and what you're up to.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Is that what it's about, you think?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

I think, I think it is.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) This retail politics where you?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Yeah. I think that's it. I think that is what it's about because it's really hard to get a grasp on reality right now, you know. Look, I think we have, you know, an administration in Washington that's sort of living in an evidence-free zone. Not exactly connected with what's going on in terms of facts and evidence here and around the world. And people, you know, they want a connection.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) I asked the Senator if she's better in personal than on television. She says it's what everybody tells her.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

But the TV is very, you know, confining. I was at a senior - I was at a nursing home in - outside of Buffalo last week. Going around and shaking hands. And one of the aged goes - 'Why, you're so much thinner. You're so much smaller.' And I said 'Well, yes, ma'am.' And she goes, 'Now, how did that happen?' I said, 'Well, I don't know. I mean, it's just different on TV.'

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) Now, the day truly begins as the Senator and her entourage, including her secret service detail in trademark black SUVs speed across the New York countryside, headed for the old eerie canal town of Palmyra, where development of the canal as a tourist attraction is on the minds of the locals.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

I was entranced with the canal. Of course, I love the fact that it was originally called 'Clinton's ditch.' You know, this makes me feel very connected in a personal way. Okay. You're so welcome.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) It quickly becomes clear that the Senator is not adverse to photographs.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Where is the cafe sign?

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) Lots...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Here we go. Can you see everybody?

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) ...and lots of photographs.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Can you get it all now?

PALMYRA RESIDENT (FEMALE)

Yep.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) Then, the long walk to the town's gazebo. A politician's dream. A secret service nightmare.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

We've been working to help provide loan capital to a lot of small businesses.

PALMYRA RESIDENT (FEMALE)

I think she's fabulous. I think she's more beautiful in person. But more than her beauty, she's genuine and very intelligent and well-spoken.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) But, you're a Republican?

PALMYRA RESIDENT (FEMALE)

Yes, I am.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Did you support her last time?

PALMYRA RESIDENT (FEMALE)

I did not. But I think I probably will this time.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Check off Palmyra. It's on to Seneca Falls, 24 miles down the road and she's running more than an hour late.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Hi, everybody. Hi, how are you? Nice to see you. I'll come out and say hello, okay? How are you? So good to see you all. Hi. Hi. Thank you so much. And it is, indeed, an honor to be here.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) She's here to take a vow for the $800,000 in Federal funding she's obtained for the National Women's Hall of Fame. Its future site, our next stop. That's when controversy strikes. Unexpectedly, in the form of just two words.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) So, to honor women here. It's perfect place to ask you, is America ready for a female president?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, I hope so. It just depends upon, you know, when and if that happens. We'll just have to stay tuned.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) The words 'stay tuned' were construed by AP wire service reporter standing behind me to be a coy hint from Clinton regarding her presidential aspirations. The next morning, papers around the world carried the story, including the New York Post. A glimpse, perhaps, into why the senator is so famously cautious about what she says. But the show here must go on. Next stop, the lakeside village of Moravia, where the Senator meets with a small group of working mothers and their children.

MORAVIA RESIDENT (FEMALE)

Hi.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

How are you?

MORAVIA RESIDENT (FEMALE)

Good.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

How old are you?

MORAVIA RESIDENT (FEMALE)

Five.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Five years old. You know, I had glasses just like that when I was your age. I love your glasses.

MORAVIA RESIDENT (FEMALE)

Thank you.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) So, okay, it's now 3:00. We're an hour behind.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

That does seem to be the story of my life.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Voiceover) But there's always time for one more picture.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

You look great. Okay. Everybody here? A couple more. And that's great.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Hand-to-hand campaigning. Pundits say Senator Clinton must win and win big in Upstate New York, where a majority of voters went for President Bush last time. To make a credible case, she could win a presidential election, if she decides to run. When we come back, the Senator takes aim at President Bush.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) We continue now on the campaign trail. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has been accused of being calculating, opportunistic, even of lacking any principles with regard to both the war in Iraq and her marriage. By 6 PM, the Clinton caravan has arrived in Cazenovia, New York at a big, red barn, where we will sit down to talk about it all.

GRAPHICS: MAP OF CAZENOVIA, NEW YORK

(Off-camera) As you know, the left wing blogs - you're not their favorite person at the moment.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

You know, we work together. We have common cause in some areas. We disagree in others. But that's true with everybody.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) You must scratch your head sometimes, though. I mean, either you're too liberal. You're not liberal enough.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Yeah. It's sort of like the Goldilocks theory of politics, you know? But I have a pretty good idea how difficult it is to be universally liked. And I don't expect that.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) So, an association game, if you will, a word or two about the following political folks, okay? President George Bush.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Disappointing.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Because?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Oh, on so many fronts. You know, I think our country is really headed in the wrong direction. And after 9/11, we were united. And there was an opportunity for leadership that pulled us together, not just in the immediate aftermath of that horrific attack, but for months and years. And called us to sacrifice on behalf of a larger, national purpose. But that didn't happen. And we have paid a big price for it.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) All right. So George Bush is disappointing. What about John McCain?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Intriguing. You know, I know him as a colleague and a friend. He is someone who has strong opinions and doesn't hesitate to express them. I agree in some areas. Disagree with many others. But I enjoy his company.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Hillary Clinton?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Hmm. Well, I'm gonna leave that to others. I am myself. So, you know, I don't have much objectivity. I am who I am.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) If you could pick an adjective that you hope people would use to describe you, what would it be?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Real. You know, I think that when you've been in the public eye as long as I have and you are basically viewed through so many different lenses, and there has been kind of a cottage industry in trying to turn me into a caricature of who I am. I have loved the opportunity in the last seven years in New York for people to get to know me.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) So, you've campaigned all day today.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

I did.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) And perhaps the greatest campaigner in our generation played golf today.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

That's right. That's right.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) I wanna ask you about something that's on the minds of a lot of people, which is, is your marriage fair game? The New York Times clearly thinks so. Front-page article about how many days you spend with your husband, 14 is their answer, a month. How angry did that article make you?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Not at all. You know, I just don't pay any attention to it. I really don't. My attitude is I have no control over what somebody wants to talk about or write about.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Really?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Really.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) It doesn't hurt. It doesn't make you mad? I mean, it would sure make me mad, I think.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

No. Well, maybe I've just been at this too long. It just, you know, I learned really a long time ago, you take criticism seriously but not personally. You know, everybody lives their lives differently. And my life is mine. And I'm not gonna cede it to anybody. I'm not giving up any piece of it. I'm not, you know, letting anybody have any control over it. I live my life according to my best values and what I think is important. And people can make their own judgments about it.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Are you a different person in that regard today, as you sit here at 58, than you were at 28, 38?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Certainly. You know, I think that's one of the great gifts of life, if you're willing to keep learning. You know, that's been something I've worked very hard at.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) I wanna turn to Iraq.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Yes.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) And probe a little bit on what your position is at this point. You were one of the Democrats who cast a vote in favor of enabling the President to go into Iraq. Do you, as we sit here today, with the information we have today, regret casting that vote?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, I can only look at what I knew at the time because I don't think you get do-overs in life. I think you have to take responsibility. And hopefully, learn from it and go forward. I regret very much the way the President used the authority he was given because I think he misled the Congress, and he misled the country. And he misused the authority.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) As we sit here today, was it a mistake to go into Iraq?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, given this administration's track record, they have been nothing but a series of mistakes. So even if one could say they made mistakes and they shouldn't have done it, right now, we're in a series of challenging decisions. And they aren't demonstrating the leadership necessary.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) You know, even some of your supporters, though, and I talked to a couple today, want you to say, 'I'm sorry I cast the vote. I'm sorry I enabled the President.'

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, I understand that because certainly the feelings about Iraq are very raw and deep. And I share them. But I don't think that's responsible. And I've taken a lot of heat from my friends who have said, 'Please, just, you know, throw in the towel and say let's get out by a date certain.' I don't think that's responsible, either. And it may be frustrating for some, but I don't think complicated situations in life or, frankly, in foreign policy and military affairs often lend themselves to answers that can be put into a sound byte. And I would like us to be gone as soon as we responsibly can, but I also wanna be sure that we've exhausted every alternative, politically, diplomatically, to try to support this government, which, after all, is trying.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Is there a link between Iraq - the war in Iraq and terrorism? The President says, yes. What do you say?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, the President is right, if you're talking about today, but not if you're going back to 9/11 or 2002, when the vote was cast or even March 2003, when the invasion occurred. I just wish that this President and Vice President would get out of the bubble they're in, quit listening to the people their listening, change they're national security team and maybe bring in some new voices, which is why I've called for the resignation or the firing, frankly, of Donald Rumsfeld. But instead, they're back to, you know, business as usual. Trying to make links that don't exist. Trying to draw historical analogies that are not accurate. I think that does a great disservice, not only to the American people but, frankly, to the quality of decision-making. You know, I believe if you're a responsible decision maker, you can never close your mind to the facts on the ground or to people who might have a different point of view. But in this White House, it's a small circle of people. Frankly, it's an echo chamber.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) So the only person in America who seems not to be talking about whether or not you're gonna run for president is you. So let me just ask you the question directly, are you running for president in 2008?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

I am not thinking about that at all. You know, I, I know everybody else is. And lots of other people are saying, 'Oh, she is, she is.' But the truth is, I don't think about it. I haven't made any decision about it because that's not how I think and how I work.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) So to New Yorkers who say, 'Senator, are you gonna be around for the full six years of your term if we re-elect you?' You say?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

I say, 'Right now, I'm not thinking about anything else except being re-elected. And I hope you will support me in November. I hope I've earned your vote.'

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) And if someone other than you were having to make a decision about running for president...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

You're good. You're good.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) I'm trying. Realistic to say, has - the decision has to be made by whomever is going to run by next spring?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Again, I don't buy any of that. You know, my husband made a decision to run in October of the year before. Other people work for decades.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) You know, to someone who's not involved in politics, this may sound like a foolish question to you. But I have to tell you it's a sincere one - why would anyone want to be president? Can you help me understand that?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, I think, if someone did and were willing to run the gauntlet to do it, that person would have to believe that you could provide service to the country and leadership at a time when it's desperately needed. And instead, we get sort of partisan rhetoric and political gamesmanship and finger pointing and blame placing. And that's not leadership. People are pretty smart. And they know we don't have it right now. So, whoever would come next would have to believe in their heart that they could do that. And that's what the country needs more than anything right now.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Sounds like a woman who's running for office.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Well, for the Senate. Again, I hope.

CYNTHIA MCFADDEN (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Today, Senator Clinton has raised over $47 million for her barely contested Senate race. She told me the funds are to help her stay on top of her, quote, 'political situation.' They are not, she said, a war chest for a presidential run. When we come back, a surprise visit from the ex-president himself.

COMMERCIAL BREAK] [EOF999

"The Early Show," CBS, 9/11/2006

Right after 9/11, party politics was not part of the war on terror. But now, Democrats say the Bush administration has not done enough to protect Americans. Republicans say that no attacks on the US since 9/11 is proof that the war on terror is working. New York Senator Hillary Clinton has been in the middle of that debate, and she joins us here this morning.

Good morning. Thanks for being with us.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning, Harry.

SMITH: One of the questions we've been asking for the last week, are we safe? Are we safer? And the question I want to ask this morning, is the world any less dangerous than it was five years ago?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, we are, you know, we are safer. We're not safe enough. And the world is dangerous, the world's always been dangerous. But now we have a lot of copy cats, jihadist terrorists. We've got a lot of spreading of this ideology. So we need to be safer, and we need to be smarter. We have to have a very strong but effective response.

SMITH: Has the country done enough where--the fighting in Afghanistan has re-escalated again, the Taliban has reconstituted itself, the numbers in some places even greater than it was before. How can it be five years later, we're still fighting that battle?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, we took our eye off the ball. I mean, we diverted resources and attention to Iraq, and we didn't finish the job. That, to me, is one of the great missed opportunities, and I don't understand why that happened, but it did. And so now we're going to have to get more NATO troops, more American support to go in to support the government of Afghanistan, to try to, you know, redo what we should have done right the first time.

SMITH: You were among those who advocated going to war in Iraq. We're in Iraq now, more than 2500 Americans have died there. There's still an unbelievable lethal situation on the ground, day to day for Iraqi civilians. The president says this is the centerpiece in the war on terror. Do you believe it, that that is true?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I did not advocate that. I voted to give the president authority to have the United States Congress behind him when he went to the UN to put inspectors back in, to figure out what Saddam Hussein had. That would not have been the choice, in my opinion, that we should have pursued at that time, but you know, I thought it was reasonable to give him that authority. Nevertheless, it is a big problem now. It is a source of terrorists, and getting better tactics, learning how to be suicide bombers, learning how to do the IEDs.

SMITH: Whether there were no terrorists before, it's full of terrorists now.

Sen. CLINTON: That's--it's full of people who are learning and applying tactics in terrorism that have been both imported from Afghanistan, Iran and elsewhere, and now can be exported.

SMITH: Very quickly, there's a tug of war of words, as it were, between Christy Todd Whitman and Mayor--former Mayor Giuliani, about this--the lethality, or the dangerous level of the air here at ground zero. Do you remember that time? And who is, in the end, responsible for people not wearing respirators?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I remember it very well, because I think I was the first person within days who said, you know, this air is not safe, and we've got to protect the people who are working on the pile. The federal government basically lied. They said the air was safe to breath, they tried to dismiss the concerns that many of us had, and people are suffering now. All levels of government should have done more. We should have done more to be honest with people about what they were actually encountering, we should have done more to make sure that the men and women who were on that pile day in and day out had appropriate equipment to protect themselves.

SMITH: Senator Clinton, we thank you so much for your time this morning. We do appreciate it.

Sen. CLINTON: Thanks.

SMITH: You bet.

Much more from ground zero on this anniversary of 9/11. We'll be right back.

HANNAH STORM, co-host (Washington, DC):

We'll have much more from ground zero coming up, and from here in Washington, DC. We're reporting from the Pentagon, where 184 people perished on 9/11. The story of a miraculous survival.

"The Situation Room," CNN, 9/11/2006

BLITZER: Joining us now from ground zero is Senator Hillary Clinton.

Senator Clinton, on this fifth anniversary of 9/11, a very somber day, are you among those Democrats who believe that too many U.S. military resources were diverted after 9/11 to fight the war in Iraq and, as a result, the U.S. is not safer today?

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY): Well, Wolf, I think we are safer, but we're not safe enough. I think that we know that our borders and our ports and our mass transit and rail systems, our bridges, our tunnels, our chemical, nuclear plants are just not yet where they need to be and we're not following the recommendations of all the experts, including the 9/11 commission, that we distribute money here at home based on what the risk is.

So my primary focus today, as I spent time with family members and, you know, reflected back the last five years, is whether we've done everything we know to do to protect our citizens here in New York and across America and I think, unfortunately, the answer is not yet.

BLITZER: I ask the question because of what your Democratic colleague, Senator John Rockefeller of West Virginia, said over the weekend. He is the vice chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, as you know.

He said, "Saddam wasn't going to attack us. He would have been isolated there. He would have been in control of that country, but we wouldn't have depleted our resources preventing us from prosecuting a war on terror, which is what this is all about."

He's suggesting that we'd be better off today if the U.S. had not gone to war and removed Saddam Hussein.

CLINTON: Well, I have the highest regard for him and he has been at the forefront of an effort to try to get the facts out.

I mean, one of the challenges we've had, frankly, the last five years in making policy and assessing risks and threats and figuring out what we need to do in a united way on behalf of our security, is the real difficulty in getting the facts out and having a system that is based on evidence as opposed to ideology or wishful thinking or whatever other brand of decision-making is going on.

So I think that for many of us, the fact that the Taliban is resurgent, that al-Qaeda is still present in Afghanistan, that the government that has been valiantly try to pull that country together there is under tremendous pressure, is deeply concerning.

After all, the attacks against us that destroyed the towers behind me came from al-Qaeda, in safe haven from the Taliban in Afghanistan. And there is no doubt, no one with a straight face can doubt that we diverted resources away from our primary mission.

Now, there may be other missions in this global war against terror, but the primary mission was to defeat and destroy those who attacked us and we still haven't finished the job.

BLITZER: So knowing what you know now, had you known that before the vote authorizing the president to go to war, would you have voted for that resolution?

CLINTON: Well, Wolf, I've answered that a million times. You know, you don't get do-overs in life. You have to make decisions based on the information that you are given and, unfortunately, the authority given the president that could have usefully been employed to send in inspectors and keep them there and make sure that, you know, Saddam didn't go off on some wild tangent was not followed through on and we know the results.

But we've got to deal with the facts as we face them today. We have a very dangerous situation in Iraq. We have a dangerous situation in Afghanistan. We have a dangerous situation in the Middle East.

We have a deteriorating set of situations in Africa. You can go around the globe. And, you know, my duty as a Senator, especially representing New York, is to try to figure out what we need to be doing with our resources, with our young men and women in uniform, with our law enforcement capacity, with the many different elements of our power, not just military, but also diplomatic, economic, and political, to make us safer and to try to work hand-in-hand with like-minded people around our globe.

And I think we have a lot of work to do and it would be my hope that we would get back to a sense of unity that would come together, look at the evidence, be honest about the risks we face, frankly, the lessons that we should have learned in the last five years, the mistakes that have been made, and try to have a smart strategy that will be effective in protecting our country and defeating our enemy.

BLITZER: We're almost out of time, Senator, but what about this "ABC" movie that began airing last night, part one? I don't know if you have had a chance to see the revisions, the final cuts that were made given the concern that several of former President Clinton's advisers, including the former president and yourself, had made that they weren't being accurate as far as the 9/11 commission report.

Did you have a chance to see the film last night?

CLINTON: No, I didn't. I have no intention of doing so. You know, the facts are, you know, very well-developed in the 9/11 commission. This is a serious matter.

This is historically important that we get it right. There's no need to embroider, to make things up. We ought to be looking at the facts and then we ought to be determining what we should do as a nation in order to make our country safer.

BLITZER: One final political question, Senator, before I let you go.

You said the other day two words that intrigued a lot of people, the words "stay tuned" when asked about if you are running for president down the road.

I know you have to first get re-elected in New York state, but it doesn't look like you have a very tough contest coming up.

How long should we stay tuned for your answer?

CLINTON: Well, that was totally taken out of context and, you know, I've responded to that.

But the important thing today is, you know, not to get into politics. I've suspended my campaign.

I want to keep the focus where it needs to be, on the solemn, sober moment that we have today to reflect and remember and I hope people across the country are joining us in doing that.

BLITZER: What's the most important thing all of us should look back and remember on this day, looking back five years ago, Senator?

CLINTON: Well, at a personal level, to really cherish your relationships and love those that are in your family and your friends and just don't take anything for granted in life.

And on a more global or national level, you know, let's just resolve that we're going to be united as a country in the face of the threats that we confront and let's try to get beyond politics. Let's try to, you know, have that same spirit renewed that we had in the days and weeks immediately following 9/11.

That's what we owe our children.

BLITZER: Senator Clinton, thanks very much for spending a few moments with us on this fifth anniversary of 9/11.

CLINTON: Thank you, Wolf.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

"Today," NBC, 9/11/2006

MR. LAUER: New York's junior senator, Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton, will be here at Ground Zero all morning long to help commemorate those lost on 9/11.

Senator Clinton, good to have you here. Good morning.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you.

MR. LAUER: Let me ask you the question that so many Americans are going to ask each other and their leaders this morning, and that is, are we safer today, five years after these attacks of 9/11?

SEN. CLINTON: I think it is fair to say that we are safer, but we're not safe enough. We still have a lot of work to do. We have to make our borders and our ports and our rail and mass transit systems safer than they are today. We've got to make sure our bridges and our tunnels and our infrastructure is protected; nuclear and chemical plants, for example.

We have done a lot, but we still haven't put the money where the threat and the risk is. I mean, that was one of the major recommendations to come out of the 9/11 commission report. It's something that I wish we would do more of, because the intelligence I see -- and obviously none of us sees the president's intelligence, which is the overall look at the threats and the risks -- but what I do see shows that New York is still the number one target of the terrorists. And so much of the money has been spread broadly instead of concentrated.

MR. LAUER: We conducted a poll and asked people, are they safer? Do they at least feel safer? Seventy-four percent said, "Yes, I feel safer today than I did" prior to -- or, you know, right after 9/11. How much credit does the Bush administration deserve for that number?

SEN. CLINTON: They deserve credit. The Congress deserves credit. Governors and mayors, police and fire departments deserve credit. I think it's been an incredible national effort. But I still think that there are big gaps and that there are missing opportunities that we haven't yet fulfilled.

MR. LAUER: In some ways, some have called it a numbers game. And I'm curious how you feel about this. Do you think that there are more or less people today, more or fewer people today, who want to bring harm to the United States than there were in the days prior to 9/11 and the actions we've taken post-9/11?

SEN. CLINTON: There are probably more.

MR. LAUER: Why?

SEN. CLINTON: I think, first of all, the copycat effect that always happens when there's some kind of a tragic event -- from our perspective, tragic; from our enemies' perspective, you know, explosive, worldwide attention. People are going to want to be in that category, unfortunately.

I think also that we've seen actions take place in countries, not just our own -- Britain, Spain, Indonesia, India, other places -- where there are lots of local groups that share the ideology.

MR. LAUER: But our response to 9/11 in particular, Senator, has it created more enemies, in your opinion?

SEN. CLINTON: I think that there is certainly a very strong case to be made that in Iraq people are now turning into suicide bombers. The insurgents and the foreign jihadist terrorists have learned a lot. They have acquired skills that they didn't necessarily have before. We're seeing suicide bombing now in Afghanistan, something that we never saw before.

So the source of the hatred, the source of the conflict, has probably spread beyond just the small group called al Qaeda.

MR. LAUER: The president announced and confirmed last week something most of us have thought for a while, that the CIA had secret sites around the world where they interrogated and detained terror suspects, people like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, and used alternative questioning methods.

Are you comfortable that the United States did not break the law in conducting that kind of interrogations in those secret sites?

SEN. CLINTON: We just don't know, Matt. We're trying to learn more. What I'm interested in is what's effective. You know --

MR. LAUER: Do the ends justify the means?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, it depends. You know, we don't know what the ends necessarily are or what the means have to be. What I'm concerned about is that there's a dispute going on within our government between very experienced interrogators, like those of the FBI, and some who have gone the extra step in ways that we may or may not either approve of or think is effective.

My bottom line is, what will keep us within the rule of law and work? And I think there was a tendency to sort of throw out the rulebook, throw out the past; you know, we have to do something different. Well, sometimes what worked in the past does work now and into the future. We have to learn a lot more about what went on than we have up until today.

MR. LAUER: Senator Clinton, good to have you here.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you.

MR. LAUER: I know you'll be here all morning.

SEN. CLINTON: Yes. Thanks, Matt.

"The Early Show," CBS, 9/11/2006

MR. SMITH: One of the questions that we've been asking for the last week -- are we safe? Are we safer? And the question I want to ask this morning, is the world any less dangerous than it was five years ago?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, we are -- you know, we are safer. We're not safe enough. And the world is dangerous. The world has always been dangerous. But now we have a lot of copycat jihadist terrorists. We've got a lot of spreading of this ideology. So we need to be safer and we need to be smarter. We have to have a very strong but effective response.

MR. SMITH: Has the country done enough? The fighting in Afghanistan has re-escalated again. The Taliban has reconstituted itself in numbers in some places even greater than it was before. How can it be, five years later, we're still fighting that battle?

SEN. CLINTON: Oh, we took our eye off the ball. I mean, we diverted resources and attention to Iraq and we didn't finish the job. That, to me, is one of the great missed opportunities. And I don't understand why that happened, but it did. And so now we are going to have to get more NATO troops, more American support, to go in to support the government of Afghanistan, to try to redo what we should have done right the first time.

MR. SMITH: You are among those who advocated going to war in Iraq. We're in Iraq now. More than 2,500 Americans have died there. There is still an unbelievably lethal situation on the ground day to day for Iraqi civilians.

The president says this is the centerpiece in the war on terror. Do you believe that is true?

SEN. CLINTON: I did not advocate that. I voted to give the president authority to have the United States Congress behind him when he went to the U.N. to put inspectors back in to figure out what Saddam Hussein had. That would not have been the choice, in my opinion, that we should have pursued at that time. But, you know, I thought it was reasonable to give him that authority.

Nevertheless, it is a big problem now. It is a source of terrorists and getting better tactics, learning how to be suicide bombers, learning how to --

MR. SMITH: Where there were no terrorists before, it's full of terrorists now.

SEN. CLINTON: It's full of people who are learning and applying tactics in terrorism that have been both imported from Afghanistan, Iran and elsewhere and now can be exported.

MR. SMITH: Very quickly, there's a tug of war of words, as it were, between Christie Todd Whitman and former Mayor Giuliani about the lethality or the dangerous level of the air here at Ground Zero. Do you remember that time? And who is, in the end, responsible for people not wearing respirators?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I remember it very well, because I think I was the first person, within days, who said, you know, "This air is not safe, and we've got to protect the people who are working on the pile."

The federal government basically lied. They said the air was safe to breathe. They tried to dismiss the concerns that many of us had. And people are suffering now. All levels of government should have done more. We should have done more to be honest with people about what they were actually encountering. We should have done more to make sure that the men and women who were on that pile day in and day out had the appropriate equipment to protect themselves.

MR. SMITH: Senator Clinton, we thank you so much for your time this morning; do appreciate it.

"Hardball," MSNBC, 9/11/2006

MR. MATTHEWS: On the morning when the United States was attacked, New York Senator Hillary Clinton was in Washington preparing for a Senate committee meeting. After the planes hit the twin towers, she immediately returned to New York. Here's her personal reflection from that day and the weeks that fol-lowed.

(Begin videotaped segment.)

SEN. CLINTON: We took a helicopter into the city. As we were helicoptering over Ground Zero, we hov-ered above it. I can't think of anything other than "Dante's Inferno." I mean, it was as close to a visual de-piction of hell as I've ever seen.

And, you know, we landed. We went into the area of Ground Zero with the governor and the mayor. And I remember watching the firefighters coming out of this wall of black soot, dragging their axes, some of them, you know, totally exhausted. They'd been on duty 24 hours straight. And I just -- you know, my eyes were just totally teared up from the emotions plus the toxic stew that was in the air.

And I just watched these men come out of that hell and I just was so overwhelmed by their courage. I mean, everything that has been said about them, every single tribute that has been given to them, is not ad-equate to what they did -- to the danger they ran into, to the lives they saved.

MR. MATTHEWS: Can you remember where you were when you first heard?

SEN. CLINTON: Absolutely. I was getting ready to leave my house here in Washington to come to a committee meeting of the so-called Health Committee. Laura Bush was scheduled to testify that morning to our committee. And Mrs. Bush had been taken to safety. Obviously the meeting was not going to be held.

The Secret Service sort of came to me and said, you know, "We want to get you out of here. We don't know what's going to happen." And I paid attention to them, as I have for the last many years. So I said, "Where are we going to go?" And they said, "Well, why don't you go back home till we know what's going on."

So, you know, I took a couple of staff with me because I knew we were going to have to figure out who to contact. And I started trying to call, first of all, my daughter. She'd been in New York that morning, staying with one of her friends who, you know, lived downtown. My husband was in Australia. I'm trying to find him.

So I get back to my house and I'm just glued in front of the TV set, you know, dialing up, talking to people, you know, obviously talking to my colleagues, talking to my staff, talking to the governor, talking to the mayor, putting in a call to the president; just, you know, "What are we to do? What is expected?"

You know, later that day we had a full Senate meeting over at the Capitol Hill police headquarters.

MR. MATTHEWS: When did you talk to your husband?

SEN. CLINTON: I finally reached him, you know, sometime that day. It all blurs together. You know, the president, President Bush, sent a plane for him to get him back, which I thought was a very kind gesture on his part. So we were out of communication after -- you know, basically he said he was all right. He wanted to know how we were and tried to get more information from me. And then we were out of communication for hours because he was on the plane. But, you know, he finally got home.

Now, Chelsea, with so many people from Lower Manhattan, you know, had to walk north, you know, so many blocks. And it was just an extraordinary experience for her and the friends that she was with.

MR. MATTHEWS: You're a senator from New York. And how do you think that affected your feelings on 9/11?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, Chris, I think I would have been affected, as most of us were, no matter where I was or what I was doing. But the fact that I felt such a sense of responsibility was just overwhelming. I cannot tell you how just deeply emotionally impacted I was.

I wanted to be there to help the victims. I wanted to be there to help the survivors. I wanted to be there to help the city. So the fact that I had a job that was connected with trying to be in some way supportive and responsive both made it more real, because I had to get up every single day and figure out what I was going to do, and much more personal than I think would have been even possible had I been somewhere else in the country.

MR. MATTHEWS: When the 9/11 hijackers went into the buildings, people say they were shrieking with delight.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, we've heard that before. We heard stories of people who, in this religious frenzy that they get worked into or manipulated into -- I've never quite figured that out -- feel as though they're going to paradise.

And it is a mind-set that is very difficult for people like us to even penetrate. We don't understand how someone could worship death, who could believe that they would be rewarded in paradise for murdering innocent people. Now, frankly, the ones who sent them to their death are the real masterminds of this.

MR. MATTHEWS: The question is raised and argued that the world is different after 9/11. What do you think?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think it certainly is for me. It is for many Americans in the way that an event of such enormous importance just sort of divides your life, sort of pre-9/11, post-9/11. And for thousands of people, life will never be the same.

But I think it's also important that we maintain our values and our common sense about who we are as people and how we have to promote our interests and our concerns in the world and how we have to make more friends and allies and not enemies, because if we're in for a long struggle, as we hear all the time -- and I don't doubt that; I think it is a struggle against an ideology that has religious overtones to it -- then we've got to be smart about how we are dealing with that.

So we can't act as though we're all born on 9/11. We have to look at history. We have to learn from history. We have to, you know, summon the best among us. We have to be smart about, you know, what's the best way to defeat this new enemy we have.

So I think it's a combination of, yes, recognizing it was an unbelievable shift in thinking and an historic mile-stone, but, you know, we're Americans and we have a lot that we can draw on and we believe and our convictions, and how we then present that to the world is really important. So I hope that we kind of carry both the significance of the event but also place it in a larger context as we go forward in the world.

U.S. SENATORS DEBBIE STABENOW (D-MI), HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY) AND MARIA CANTWELL (D-WA) HOLD A NEWS TELECONFERENCE ON JOB CREATION, 9/14/2006

CLINTON: Well, thank you so much, Senator Cantwell. I want to thank you and Senator Stabenow, because both of you really done a terrific job in drawing attention to what can be the win-win strategy for our country.

We can, you know, strengthen our economy, create jobs, provide new technologies and exports. We can, obviously, help our environment. And we can make our security not dependent upon the oil-producing states in very dangerous, difficult parts of the world.

There are a lot of examples as to why we believe the Clean Edge Act can not only accelerate but really deepen the trends that are beginning to occur.

In New York, for example, we've got entrepreneurs converting an idle brewery into an ethanol plant, which is going to create hundreds of construction jobs and provide about 100 permanent jobs. We've got people working in fuel cells and solar. And we've really got a lot going on.

But we need to change our approach from the national level, get new incentives, take away the support and subsidies for the fossil fuels, which clearly don't need them, given their high levels of profits.

And by passing the Clean Edge Act, we would create more than 530,000 jobs by the time it's fully implemented in 2009. New York would see about 27,000 of those jobs.

These jobs would be higher-paying jobs because they'd be in manufacturing, where the wages are higher. And they would be in the construction sector, where the wages are higher.

So this is a triple-win strategy. And we are just doing everything we can to get the word out. And we want to thank the Apollo Alliance and the Economic Policy Institute for producing this study, which clearly under-scores the significance of the legislation that we are promoting.

And I'm going to have to sign off. But I just wanted to jump on to underscore my commitment to the Clean Edge Act and to what it represents and then turn it back to Senators Cantwell and Stabenow.

DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON FEDERAL HELP FOR 9/11 RESPONDERS, 9/20/2006

MALONEY: Our senator is our first speaker: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton who has worked tirelessly and selflessly to help the heroes and heroines of 9/11.

Thank you for coming.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Carolyn.

And we are here as a united team on behalf of those brave men and women who rushed in to save others; who labored for days, weeks and months both in the rescue and then in the recovery and rebuilding efforts; the volunteers, the residents, the people who are still paying the price for the horrific attacks that were launched against New York and our country.

CLINTON: This has been an issue of great concern to me ever since I went to Ground Zero and saw it for the first time the day after the attacks. And I have consistently called for help for people who are suffering from chronic illnesses, terminal conditions who have been disabled, who have had to quit work, who's quality of life and indeed their very life has suffered.

We are asking for help from the federal government. Last week, I introduced an amendment to require the federal government to step up with $1.9 billion to continue providing help to the many people who are suffering.

You know, when Mt. Sinai, represented here by Dr. Herbert, put forth its findings, they said nearly 70 percent of the people who were tested were suffering. And about 40 percent of them had no insurance.

Dr. Kelly, who is representing the fire department, and her team have been examining our brave firefighters who cannot breathe, who cannot continue working, who are sick and, I would add, even dying.

I've written to Chairman Enzi of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee that he hold a hearing and mark up my legislation to provide this $1.9 billion to be offered in grants to take care of the people who took care of us.

This is not going away. And we're going to keep coming to our capital. We're going to keep advocating and agitating on behalf of people like John Sferazo and others, many of whom we know personally who are bearing the marks of that terrible day in September five years ago.

We have to stand with them and we have to make sure they get the health care that they need.

CLINTON: And I'm grateful that my colleagues in government, Congresswoman Maloney, Congressman Is-rael, Congressman Fossella...

(CROSSTALK)

CLINTON: And we got the $125 million. Finally, we're going to get it distributed. But that is just a down-payment, a small downpayment. We will not rest until we get the funds from our government to take care of all the people who are suffering.

MALONEY: Thank you so much, Senator.

This is a bipartisan effort.

Vito?

FOSSELLA: Thank you, Congresswoman Maloney, again, and Senator Clinton and Congressmen Pascrell and Israel and others who have joined us.

Fundamentally, what we need is a permanent and comprehensive plan from the federal government to en-sure that everybody who responded, all those responders who heroically responded in the aftermath of 9/11, gets the health care they need.

I don't want to repeat the statistics. About 40 percent or so uninsured. Forty percent more under-insured.

We see it, and the facts speak for themselves. In the New York City Fire Department, where on an annual basis perhaps 30 or so men retired due to respiratory problems, now we see on an annual basis about 150 to 160 -- overall, a factor of about 12 -- are retiring because of the pulmonary problems that they've experi-enced. Not to mention the mental illness issues that continue to grow.

Carolyn Maloney and I will be, if not already, introducing legislation to mirror that of Senator Clinton's in the Senate, to ensure that the health care dollars from the federal government are there.

The American people have been very compassionate to date, and has taken care of a lot of rebuilding New York City, ground zero, its infrastructure. And we know what it's like to cut checks for other parts of the world who need our help as well.

But we will not go away until the people, the American citizens who (inaudible) need our help get the help that they expect, that they deserve, and that the federal government should step up and help those in New York City, New Jersey, Connecticut and beyond do what's right for our fellow citizens.

Thank you.

MALONEY: Thank you so much.

I, first of all, want to thank our senator and my colleagues in government for standing with us today and for working to achieve the release of the $125 million that will be going for treatment, part of it, $65 million, the $90 for monitoring; and to thank Mt. Sinai and the fire department for their studies.

MALONEY: We had a briefing earlier this morning with members of Congress where the doctors gave the results of their studies. And the results are very harrowing, that 70 percent are sick, that 40 percent do not have any health insurance.

And we are here today to hold Congress and the president to their pledge to never forget the terrorist attacks of 9/11.

To keep this promise, the federal government must ensure that everyone who was exposed to the deadly toxins is monitored, and everyone who is sick is treated.

It has been five years since 9/11. And just as the pain of that day is still with us, sadly, neither have the health problems of so many 9/11 responders -- they still have sicknesses from it.

On that day, we lost nearly 3,000 people, but many thousands more lost their health. And we know that, from the report this morning, that our firefighters are very sick; that the firefighters, on average, have a loss of 12 years of lung capacity.

We learned that over 600 have retired from the fire department due to illnesses related to their experience at 9/11. And we know that there are at least seven deaths directly related to the toxins at Ground Zero.

What we do not know is: When will the federal government finally have a plan to deal with this emergency health problem? And we need one.

That is why I fully support a resolution that my colleague, Congressman Fossella, is putting before Congress to call upon the Department of Health and Human Services to develop a plan that will finally medically monitor everyone who was exposed, not just the responders, but the school children that were in the area, the residents, the volunteers, the federal workers who are not part of the other monitoring programs.

And that is why, three years ago, with many of my colleagues, I introduced the Remember 9/11 Health Act, which calls for complete monitoring, health treatment and much-needed research and coordination.

We are reintroducing that legislation today to include the $1.9 billion that the senator from New York is championing in the Senate.

And the time to act is now. We have to live up to our pledge to never forget. And the way to live up to that pledge is to take care of the men and women who responded heroically to help others on that day.

U.S. SENATORS CARL LEVIN (D-MI), JACK REED (D-RI) AND HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY) HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON NATIONAL SECURITY, 9/26/2006

CLINTON: Under their proposal, supported by the Democratic leadership in both houses of Congress, we would begin a phased redeployment of U.S. troops this year as a means of pressuring the Iraqis to take more responsibility for their future.

We would also be pressuring them to deal with their internal political challenges, not kick them until next year, which apparently they've decided to do; and put a real international effort together to try to decide what the neighbors were going to do to prevent a failed state on their borders.

The news reports this week regarding the April classified national intelligence estimate assessing the impact of Iraq on the global war on terror only adds more urgency to the importance of changing course in Iraq.

At this point, I would settle for just admitting that we're on the wrong course while we try to figure out what to do next. Let's have that debate in the Congress and in the country.

Having reviewed the NIE, I'm very much in favor of the decision to declassify it. This needs to be part of the debate, and this is information from those whom we entrust with assessing threats we face and providing their best analysis.

Now, this November Americans will decide if they want to change course in Iraq or whether they want to continue with a rubber-stamp Congress that continually supports a failed policy in Iraq, and now, as we can tell from what's been leaked about the NIE, a failing policy in terms of containing, deterring and defeating the terrorist leaders and operatives in the global war on terror.

This is an important choice, and we need to continually remind our fellow Americans of what is at stake. And I particularly thank my colleagues because of their leadership over many years on behalf of these issues.

QUESTION: Senator Levin, I wonder if you can elaborate on your view that releasing only the summaries of the findings of the NIE wouldn't be enough, because I believe the president just indicated that that what he's instructed Ambassador Negroponte (OFF-MIKE) you're on the Intelligence Committee.

QUESTION: You have had the opportunity to review the full reports.

Do the findings represent what we would find if we weren't able to see those reports?

LEVIN: There's a lot of material outside of the findings which is highly relevant to the Iraq war and to its relationship to the spread of terrorism in the world.

And so it shouldn't just be the findings -- they're a minority portion of the report. It should be everything in the report that relates to Iraq.

As far as I'm concerned, the entire report should be declassified -- period. But at a minimum, the entire report that relates to Iraq -- findings or the body of the report -- should be declassified.

There is material beyond the findings which is highly relevant to this subject and very, very -- I think -- enlightening and eye-opening for the American people as to the relationship between the war in Iraq and the spread on terrorism.

Give me your second question again.

QUESTION: It's following up on that. But given that you are one of the few members of Congress who has been able to read the whole thing, do the findings adequately express (OFF-MIKE)?

LEVIN: I think if my first answer covers that, I will leave it at that.

CLINTON: I've also read it. And I guess I was under the impression the entire report was going to be released. And I would urge the administration to release the entire report because, as Senator Levin has said, the report and the findings really go together. And I don't think we'd be doing a service to the American people to just selectively release it.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, and I don't know if the other senators were in the meeting with President Talabani or not (OFF-MIKE) did you engage him in this view of yours, policy has failed, something needs to be done? Did you bring that up? And if so, what was his response?

CLINTON: Well, several of us have met with President Talabani. I know that Senator Levin has, and a number of us have.

He's a very effective salesman for his point of view, and I respect that about him. He's here to present the very best possible case for continuing American involvement in Iraq.

CLINTON: But in my conversations with him -- I also saw him last week -- he certainly recognizes how difficult the problems are that Iraq confronts.

Like many of the leaders of Iraq with whom I have met over the years, he describes a lot of plans about how that's all going to be dealt with. The problem is in the execution.

And I think, as we heard yesterday from the two retired generals and the colonel, a lot of the problems in the execution, I think, is because of our poor planning and implementation in setting up the police force, in deBaathification, in disbanding the army. They're playing a lot of catch up.

So I think it's fair to say that they are obviously in an effort to try to help effect American public opinion. And I think they would be surprised to learn that all we're going to do is continue the course. And I think that's what's troubling to many of us.

LEVIN: Let me answer in terms of my conversation with President Talabani this morning.

I quoted him; what he said. I told him I find it incredible that an American president, frankly, would tell an Iraqi president that we're going to remain in Iraq until they ask us to leave, because that gives them the decision over our troops.

And I said that that is not what I believe the American people believe has got to be the case, and it sure isn't what I believe needs to be the case.

"And did the president actually tell you, President Talabani, that we're going to remain there until you ask us to leave?" And he said, "Yes."

And then he said, when I pointed out that that's an open-ended commitment, which is unacceptable, I believe, to most of the American people. It's an unlimited commitment.

In any event, speaking for at least many members of Congress, if not the majority, but many members, that is unacceptable to us to have an open-ended commitment. It takes you, the Iraqi people, off the hook. It doesn't put this decision in your hands that you have to make. It doesn't put enough pressure on you to make the compromises that only you can make to put together your country. These are political decisions. It cannot be won militarily.

LEVIN: This is a sectarian violence which the sectarian leadership needs to address.

And he said -- he didn't answer that part of it. I expressed my own views to him. I engaged him very directly in this issue. I'm sure the other members who were there -- there were four of us -- five of us, in Leader Frist's office when we met with him -- will tell you it was a very direct statement to President Talabani about -- I think they got it wrong and I think our president has it wrong if they think that the American people are going to support an open-ended commitment in Iraq.

QUESTION: He didn't say anything?

LEVIN: No, he said -- no, he said that this is what the president said. And then he said something else. He said that doesn't mean that we have a veto over the operations of American troops.

That's not what the issue is. It's not whether they have a veto over the operations. Nobody has said that, including our president.

What the president apparently told them, according to President Talabani, is that we are going to stay in Iraq as long as the Iraqis want us to stay. And that is an abdication of a decision that only an American president and an American Congress can make. And he did not directly answer that.

QUESTION: How do you respond to Condi Rice, Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: As I said yesterday, I think my husband did a great job in demonstrating that Democrats are not going to take these attacks. All you have to do is read the 9/11 Commission to know what he and his administration did to protect Americans and prevent terrorist attacks against our country.

And I'm certain that if my husband and his national security team had been shown a classified report entitled "Bin Laden Determined to Attack inside the United States," he would have taken it more seriously than history suggests it was taken by our current president and his national security team.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: I've said all I'm going to say on this.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) made in the New Yorker recently. He said that he thought the vote to support in Iraq was, quote, "a mistake," and he compared it to the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution in Vietnam.

Do you think it was a mistake? And do you think it was akin to the Gulf of Tonkin resolution?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I've said many times I regret deeply the way this president has used the authority that was given to him by the Congress and the way he continues to use it.

And there have been a series of mistakes laid out in great detail yesterday by our retired military officers who had been put into the very difficult position, first on active duty, now in retirement, of trying to figure out how we're going to recover from these mistakes.

QUESTION: But the president suggested -- President Clinton suggested that the vote itself was a mistake. Do you think the vote was a mistake?

CLINTON: I have said many times what I just said.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, yesterday in the hearing with the generals and the colonel, Senator Clinton, you asked the question specifically about their thoughts on troop withdrawal regarding a date certain.

What was your assessment of what they said? They seemed to indicate that more troops were needed. I just want to get your take on it, since the amendment that Senator Reed and Senator Levin offered said somewhat the contrary.

CLINTON: Well, I'm going to let them speak for themselves. They are certainly more than competent to express their opinions on military matters. And what came through loudly and clearly was that they feel like there has been a series of strategic and tactical blunders that have rendered our position in Iraq dangerous and difficult, but that it could get even worse. And by getting worse, they were very clear that that could spread to a larger regional conflict.

And what I have always appreciated about what Senators Levin and Reed have done is they have been very focused on trying to figure out how to improve our situation on the ground. The phased redeployment is part of a broader strategy of trying to bring in new thinking and new strategic and tactical efforts to try to turn this around.

Because, as you may recall from yesterday, I prefaced my question by saying, we don't want to see this fail. I don't think any American does. And certainly those of us who have been there and have worried and worked over this are still looking for some glimmer of hope from this administration that we can have a more sensible, successful policy.

CLINTON: And I would just underscore that every one of them said a successful policy has to start with removing the people in charge, starting with the secretary of defense.

We will not get a new set of eyes to take an honest look at this and try to figure out how to be more effective with the current leadership in place.

QUESTION: Initial meetings you had this morning with Talabani, they were bipartisan meetings, but did you all lawmakers go with the same message, saying that it's not open-ended?

CLINTON: There were a couple meetings.

LEVIN: Yes, I can't speak for the other meeting.

QUESTION: Yes, but...

LEVIN: In my meeting, that was my message. I got there a little bit late, so I don't know what all the messages were from the other four or five leaders that were there.

While I was there, however, that was my message. It wasn't the others.

That doesn't mean that the others who were there didn't share it. We were running out of time. And it doesn't mean that their message wasn't similar before I got there because I got there a little late.

And I wasn't at the other meeting, though, so I can't...

QUESTION: Do you think that the U.S. Army right now could do more to support the Iraqi army operations in Baghdad? I know it's a matter of some controversy in the army itself. Should we be redeploying people out of the forward operating bases into Baghdad to support this effort?

REED: Well, I think the most significant fact is limited resources in terms of troops in Iraq that's been consistent throughout.

So if you move forces from other parts of Iraq, you open up areas which could be exploited by the insurgents.

QUESTION: The question is whether you move forces that are currently based in forward operating bases into the city of Baghdad, and whether or not you double and triple the amount of U.S. advisers who were assigned to Iraq battalions.

Clearly, we have the forces to do that.

REED: Well, when you're talking about doubling and tripling the number of advisers, I don't know if you necessarily off the top of your head say, "We certainly can do that."

These are specialized people. They should have talents. They should have linguistic abilities, we hope.

So it's not a resource that's there in great quantities.

But the strategy that General Chiarelli and General Casey are pursuing now is essentially to try to go ahead and clear Baghdad.

REED: That requires forces. And if we have more American forces, I think it would go much more effectively. But they need additional Iraqi forces.

In fact, one of the complaints last week by one of the battalion commanders, or brigade commanders, was he's requested additional Iraqi forces. They're not coming because they don't want to go to Baghdad. That is a problem with the Iraqi military forces. It's a chronic problem.

Now, one other piece is clearing these neighborhoods -- is one thing. But unless we follow that up with strong reconstruction, employment programs, the other part of the equation of an anti -- counterinsurgency, we'll just be clearing them for the next several years.

That's where this administration, I think, has failed miserably in terms of providing the civilian complement to military power. And if they don't get it right in Baghdad, then we can clear it as long as we like and we'll be going back clearing it again and again and again.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, you talked about trying to figure out what to do next. Just a quick question about that. Do you think Democrats -- you're trying to recapture the House and Senate. Do you think the Democrats have offered a specific enough strategy to how to win in Iraq, enough for the voters to understand what the competing vision is?

CLINTON: Well, I certainly think we've offered a very thoughtful assessment and strategy that has been embodied in the work that both Senators Levin and Reed have done. Unfortunately, it doesn't get much of an audience.

And it's very hard to talk about what we can do because we have the same people in charge who have failed consistently now over the last four-plus years.

So we can have the best strategy in the world, but we know very well that there is no way we can move forward on it given the current mindset and personnel within the Bush administration.

So I think that anybody who has followed what Carl and Jack and some of us have been saying, we do have different ideas. We would certainly listen more and follow the advice of the professional military.

CLINTON: We have some excellent active duty and retired officers who have written and spoken at length about what needs to be done, but it just seems like they're just whistling in the wind. Nobody is listening who's in charge in this current administration.

So one of the reasons -- and obviously, you know, we're Democrats. One of the reasons why we're hoping that we get a change in Congress is because that will finally give us some leverage to perhaps change the strategy and get some attention from this administration in negotiations and in oversight hearings about what we can do to possibly salvage the situation we find ourselves in.

And don't forget: Afghanistan is also in a much more tenuous position than it either should be or was immediately after our action there.

LEVIN: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY) DELIVERS RE-MARKS AT THE COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, 10/31/2006

(JOINED IN PROGRESS)

CLINTON: You all know the litany of threats and challenges: the metastasizing threat of terrorists networks recruiting troops, setting up training camps, amassing weapons; a regime in North Korea openly testing mis-siles and nuclear weapons; an activist, expansionist Iran pursuing its own nuclear arsenal; a resurgent Tali-ban in Afghanistan; and an emerging civil war in Iraq; Russia and China pursuing their own interests, often at odds with such global imperatives as nuclear nonproliferation; and ending genocide in Darfur.

Oil has never been more important in funding unstable, anti- American governments and yet we have failed to make the investments necessary to move more rapidly to alternative fuels, a policy that is now as im-portant to our national security and our Mideast strategy as to our economy and environment.

The lost opportunities of the years since September 11th are the stuff of tragedy. Remember the people rallying in sympathy on the streets of Tehran; the famous headline, "We are all Americans now." Five years later, much of the world wonders what America is now.

As we face this landscape of failure and disorder, nothing is more urgent than for us to begin again to rebuild a bipartisan consensus to ensure our interests, increase our security and advance our values.

CLINTON: It could well start with what our founders had in mind when they pledged a decent respect for the opinions of mankind in the Declaration of Independence.

I think it's fair to say we are now all internationalists and we are all realists.

This administration's choices were false ones: internationalism versus unilateralism, realism versus idealism. Is there really any argument that America must remain a preeminent leader for peace and freedom, and yet we must be more willing to work in concert with other nations and international institutions to reach common goals?

The American character is both idealistic and realistic. Why can't our government reflect that?

I want to suggest three principles I believe should underlie a bipartisan consensus on national security, and consider how they apply to some of the most difficult challenges we face.

First, and most obviously, we must by word and deed renew internationalism for a new century. We did not face World War II alone. We did not face the Cold War alone. And we cannot face the global terrorist threat or other profound challenges alone either.

A terrorist cell may recruit in Southeast Asia, train in Central Asia, find funds in the Middle East and plan attacks in the U.S. or Europe.

We can stop a deadly disease anywhere along the line as it hop- scotches from continent to continent, or we can wait until it arrives at our own doors.

We can deal with climate change together now or excuse its calamitous consequences later.

We can turn our back on international institutions or we can modernize and revitalize them and, when need-ed, get about the hard work of creating new ones.

Second, we must value diplomacy as well as a strong military. We should not hesitate to engage in the world's most difficult conflicts on a diplomatic front. We cannot leave the Middle East to solve itself, or avoid direct talks with North Korea.

When faced with an existential challenge to the life of our nation, President Kennedy said, "Let us never ne-gotiate from fear, but let us never fear to negotiate."

Direct negotiations are not a sign of weakness; they're a sign of leadership.

Third, our foreign policy must blend both idealism and realism in the service of American interests.

If there's one idea that has been floated about over the last six years that I would like to see debunked, with all due respect to some of the political scientists in the room, it is this false choice between realism and ide-alism.

Is it realist or idealist to stop nuclear proliferation?

CLINTON: Is it realist or idealist to come together on global warming? Is it realist or idealist to help devel-oping nations educate their children, fight diseases and grow their economies? And is it realist or idealist to believe we must turn around the ideology underpinning terrorism?

Strategies with respect to all of the problems we face require a mix of both, and each requires building that consensus approach; that we then have to do the hard work of bringing others to our side. We cannot achieve any of the solutions that we need to be pursuing without American leadership and we cannot achieve any of them alone.

American foreign policy exists to maintain our security and serve our national interests. And in an increas-ingly interdependent world, it is in our interests to stand for human rights, to promote religious freedom, democracy, women's rights, social justice and economic empowerment.

But reality informs us we cannot force others -- nations and peoples -- to accept those values. We have to support those who embrace them, and lead by example.

At our best, Americans have always lived in a creative tension between idealism and realism, between our clear-eyed insistence on seeing the world as it actually is and our deeply held desire to remake the world as it ought to be.

This administration has abandoned that tension for a simplistic division of the world into good and evil. They've refused to talk to anyone on the evil side and some have called that idealistic. I call it dangerously unrealistic.

At the end of the day, you have to question whether this administration has led with our values or used our values as a cloak to justify its ideology and unilateralism.

Something is wrong when our pursuit of idealistic goals has turned a good portion of the world against us.

CLINTON: Earlier this year, a progressive and conservative, Anatol Lieven and John Hulsman, wrote a book together called "Ethical Realism." You don't have to accept all of their policy proposals to learn something from the common ground they found.

They remind us of a time when America's leading Protestant theologian, Reinhold Niebuhr, cautioned us against believing that God was on our side; of a time when President Dwight David Eisenhower rejected rhetoric about a preemptive attack on the Soviet Union by asking, among other things, the practical question of how we would occupy the vast country if we won; of a time when the editor of Foreign Affairs invited a little-known diplomat named George Kennan to publish an article, an anonymous article, that established the bipartisan foundation of our Cold War foreign policy.

In every era, we wrestle with how to reconcile the pragmatic with the moral elements of our strength and what we choose to do with both.

We got it right, mostly, during the Cold War, when realists and idealists, together, built the institutions and policies serving our interests and our values.

We got it drastically wrong when a small group of ideologues decided we didn't need those institutions or alliances or diplomacy or even the respect of other nations.

These principles would force a sea change from the current administration's policies. If you look at the dangerous situations we face today in Iraq, Afghanistan, Iran, North Korea, the proliferation of deadly weap-ons, the prosecution of the war on terror, you will see the same mistakes repeated over and over.

The mistaken belief that alliances, international institutions, all of that irrelevant to American interests; the mistaken belief that diplomacy, even if backed by force, is synonymous with weakness; the mistaken belief that our military's experience in war planning, our intelligence community's objective analysis and our diplo-mats' experience in negotiations could be dismissed and replaced with ideological wishful thinking; and in Iraq, the mistake of waging a preemptive war based on faulty intelligence, fanciful scenarios and bluster has turned out to be a one-time-only doctrine, with no deterrent effect.

CLINTON: We need to return to patient diplomacy, backed by military strength and informed by American values.

Let me start with Iraq, because in human terms this has been a horrible month. We mourn the loss of more than 100 American servicemembers and many hundreds more Iraqis.

In political terms, we have finally reached the point of complete absurdity. The administration announces it will propose timetables or benchmarks and the Iraqi prime minister denounces them. President Bush says we are adjusting tactics, but Secretary Rumsfeld insists we are staying the course. The administration tells Iran and Syria they're responsible for helping to keep the peace, but won't talk with them about how to do it.

We continue to deny evident reality, proceeding with few -- or no -- allies and precious little direct communication with people who matter.

No wonder the American people think we are adrift.

We need a fundamental change in course, and I believe there are three basic parts to that.

First, we need to press consistently, privately and publicly the Iraqis to become serious about achieving an internal reconciliation and political solution and present real consequences for their failing to do so.

CLINTON: Only the Iraqi government can take action to create the condition for a political settlement. Instead, the government in recent days seems to be going out of its way to rebuff our efforts to move in that direction.

American credibility is held hostage by an Iraqi government that will not fulfill its pledge to seek a political resolution of the rights and roles of the Sunni minority and to determine how oil revenue is allocated.

For several years -- actually since the summer of 2003 -- I have pushed the idea that we should establish in Iraq an oil trust, guaranteeing that every individual Iraqi would share part of the country's oil wealth every year. Instead, the oil distribution remains unsettled.

Sunnis have no incentive to stop fighting, Kurds have no incentive to operate within Iraq, and Shiites have no incentive to stop participating in militias and internecine conflict.

Guaranteeing every Iraqi a share of the oil revenues at the individual level is one way to try to begin to move beyond the impasse and to give Iraqis some reason to believe, number one, we aren't there for oil; we aren't there to support big oil; we aren't there to line the pockets of the new Iraqi elite and fatten their Swiss bank accounts; and to give the Iraqis, also, some reason to feel positive about their national government.

CLINTON: Second, we do need what many of us have been calling for now for months, even years at this point: a public international conference of the parties in the region -- the Turks, the Saudis, Egyptians, the Emirates, the Jordanians, but also the Syrians and Iranians. We need to put everybody on the record as to whether they will make public commitments to respect Iraq's sovereignty and to further the task of Iraq's stability.

Instead of fearing to negotiate, we should fear what happens if we never attempt to negotiate a regional commitment to a stable, unified Iraq.

And also Iraq's neighbors should fear that as well. They would bear the brunt of an all-out civil war, including millions of fleeing refugees and new bases for regional terrorist operations.

And thirdly, we do need to begin -- I had hoped by the end of this year -- a phased redeployment. I joined with Senators Levin and Reed and the Democratic leadership in the Senate and the House in proposing a phased redeployment of U.S. troops from Iraq during this year, 2006. That would also include a change in the mission of U.S. forces to one of training and supporting Iraqi troops and targeting counterterrorism (sic) as well as protecting American operations and personnel and facilities.

Richard Holbrooke in his recent article is right; we really have three choices: We muddle along, not necessarily going forward, but, as my chairman on the Armed Services Committee, John Warner, has said, moving sideways; we begin some kind of sensible, prudent de-escalation; or we escalate.

CLINTON: And we can't do any of those in the absence of either the full-hearted attempt on the part of the reconciliation front, the oil allocation front and the regional parties being involved.

But however we proceed, it is time to insist that the Iraqis take the lead and demonstrate to the Iraqi people, first and foremost, that the United States will not be in Iraq permanently; that American troops will not be put in the crossfire of a civil war.

Phased redeployment will get the attention of the Iraqi leadership.

In my meetings with members of that leadership, there has been a mixed message at best. "We are a sovereign nation," they tell me. "We make decisions now. And by the way, we're not ready for you to leave."

It is time for us to force the Iraqi government to face up to that contradiction and to begin to do more to resolve their own political situation and make it clear that American forces will not be there to prop up their denial and refusal to deal with the problems at hand.

Now, we talk a great deal, as we must, about Iraq, and not enough about Afghanistan, where our failures have squandered much of what our military accomplished and limited the reach and positive impact of President Karzai's moderate democratic government.

Three years ago, when I was here, I told the council about meeting an American soldier in Afghanistan who greeted me with these words: "Welcome to the forgotten front line in the war on terror."

Well, today, we have senior NATO military officials predicting that the country could fall back to the Taliban in six months. The use of suicide bombings and other terror tactics is on the rise. Afghanistan is now responsible for 87 percent of the world's opium production.

And a quote making the rounds in Kabul sums the situation up nicely. The Taliban commander supposedly boasted to his captors that, "You have watches, but we have time."

CLINTON: To prove him wrong, we need to give our Afghan allies time, yet all we seem to do is check our watches. Convinced, first, that we had all the answers, and then that we could subcontract out counterinsurgency to our allies, we seem to have gone on autopilot.

Inattention and false optimism are not only endangering all that we accomplished there, they are costing lives.

It is a great and brave thing that our allies from Canada, Britain, the Netherlands and other NATO countries have done by sending troops to Afghanistan. But Afghanistan and NATO need us as a leading partner to help with security, to root out corruption, to find alternatives to opium, and to improve the security situation with Pakistan.

We know the general area where the leaders of the Taliban and probably the leaders of Al Qaida are. It's a failure of our policies on all fronts that five years later they are sending waves of fighters into Afghanistan from their safe haven.

The stakes are unbearably high for Afghanistan, for Pakistan, for the country's northern neighbors in central Asia, for the reach of Al Qaida and for our own credibility and leadership.

We should begin by responding to our NATO commander's call for more troops in Afghanistan where on a per capita basis we have spent 25 times less than we spent in Bosnia and deployed 1/50 as many troops.

In Iran as well, this administration outsourced its policy to the British, the French and the Germans. Mean-while, the Iranian so-called moderates we ignored were pushed out of power and the extremists went merrily forward. Now we are left hoping that those same moderates we wouldn't talk to can regain control.

Hope is not a policy. U.S. policy must be unequivocal. Iran must not build or acquire nuclear weapons.

Iran's president has made a series of incendiary, outrageous comments, questioning the Holocaust, calling for Israel to be wiped off the map.

We know that a nuclear Iran poses a direct threat to its neighbors in the region, with Israel as its chief target. It also poses a significant threat to the United States, by combining access to nuclear materials and technology with support for terrorists whose aim is to attack and kill Americans.

We have to keep all options on the table, including being ready to talk directly to Iranians should the right opportunity present itself.

CLINTON: Direct talks, if they do nothing else, let you assess who's making decision, what their stated and unstated goals might be.

And willingness to talk sends two very important messages: first, to the Iranian people, that our quarrel is with their leaders, not with them; and second, to the international community, that we are pursuing every available peaceful avenue to prevent Iran from becoming a nuclear power.

We also need to be willing to use the tools available to us in working with the Israelis and the Palestinians.

In part because the administration chose to disengage at crucial moments, we are now at a very discourag-ing place. There is no reliable partner on the Palestinian side, and still no willingness to take a clear stand of acceptance toward Israel.

In the aftermath of the Palestinian elections that gave rise to Hamas, we need to continue to insist that any Palestinian government recognize Israel's right to exist and cease terrorism.

However, there are reports from the region of discussions between the Israeli government and President Abbas, and of the possible dissolution of the Hamas government.

As events unfold, we need to be prepared, in close coordination with our Israeli ally, to resume America's indispensable role in finding a just and lasting resolution.

In North Korea, we got some potentially good news this morning.

This administration has adopted a narrow and, you know, sort of, self-reinforcing world view that doesn't look at the facts and that rules out some of our best tools for defusing threats before they threaten us.

CLINTON: We have six years of policy with no carrots, no sticks and only bad results. And we basically left negotiations to the Chinese and left Kim Jong Il home alone with no inspectors watching his plutonium.

Now we have fewer options and a much more difficult task.

We have U.N. sanctions, though they're not as tough as I would want. We need to enforce them.

We have the six-party talks and apparently, based on what we heard this morning, after intensive discussions that included direct talks between Ambassador Chris Hill and the North Koreans, we are going to re-vive the six-party process.

We can't take anything off the table. We've had troops in South Korea for 50 years for a reason.

But I have fought for a long time we made a mistake not talking directly to North Korea.

North Korea's neighbors have long supported direct U.S.-North Korean talks on security matters. In the past, such engagement has prevented the development of plutonium bombs and the testing of long-range missiles.

Kim Jong Il needs to hear a single, unified message: Choose between nuclear weapons and aid from South Korea, China and the international community; you can not have both.

Right now, we seem to be relying, too much for my taste, on China's good will to restrain North Korea.

At the end of the day, Pyongyang will have to hear this message directly from us.

CLINTON: The common strand that draws these crises together is the threat that sophisticated terrorists, operating out of Afghanistan or Iraq or somewhere else, will be able to acquire nuclear weapons or materials.

For 40 years, the U.S. provided bipartisan leadership in building a network of treaties and expectations that kept global nuclear ambitions in check.

Countries like Brazil and Argentina and South Africa and Kazakhstan and Ukraine and Belarus elected not to develop nuclear weapons or even gave up weapons they had, giving terrorists fewer opportunities as a result.

Today we face intense extremist efforts to buy or steal either a bomb or the material to make one. And it doesn't have to be very big.

We also are seeing increased interest in peaceful uses of nuclear power on the part of many legitimate states. In response, we need to modernize the nonproliferation treaties and related agreements.

Last year we had the chance to start talking about what a stronger regime would look like at the Non-Proliferation Treaty review conference.

But while other countries sent foreign ministers or senior ambassadors, the administration sent a mid-level official a clear signal it just wasn't interested.

Our influence is already been eroded by our abandonment of the comprehensive test ban treaty and the administration's interest in developing two new small nuclear weapons, including the robust nuclear earth penetrator, the so-called "bunker buster."

The wholesale abandonment of nonproliferation efforts is a serious mistake. The more countries that have fissile material, the more opportunities for it to go astray.

American experts, like those working at the council, have made innovative proposals for a 21st-century NPT. When the Senate resumes, I'll be asking my colleagues who chair the Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees to hold joint hearings on the future of a nonproliferation policy with the aim of creating a new blueprint for our shared security.

CLINTON: And we have to increase our efforts on preventing terrorist groups from obtaining nuclear weapons or materials. You know, Sam Nunn and Ted Turner with the Nuclear Threat Initiative have said over and over again we aren't doing enough to get every last bit of weapons grade material under safeguard.

I will be introducing a bill based on their ideas which would create a senior White House adviser for counter-ing nuclear terrorism, require a yearly report that would specify every site with nuclear material or weapons.

And we would do what we have to do, working in concert with other nations, to try to make that material as safe as it can be.

Here in New York, we don't need anyone to tell us we're in a war against terrorists who seek to do us harm. Strategically, it is also true that the world is watching us. We are unlikely to make headway facing the challenges that I've discussed, and many others, if we are seen as losing ground to the terrorists.

On September 12th, 2001, when the Bush administration could count on the good will of the entire world, they had strong support from both parties and the determination of the American people to sacrifice for a common cause. That call to sacrifice never came.

Five years later, the administration has failed to transform our national security institutions. The people who promised less government have instead given us the largest and least competent government we've ever had.

As a result, our front-line fighters in the war against terrorists often lack the tools they need. The administration has ordered our military to fulfill missions for which it is not sized, equipped or funded.

I joined with other Democrats and Republicans in proposing that we expand the Army by 80,000 troops; that we move faster to expand the special forces and do a better job of training and equipping the National Guard and Reserves.

CLINTON: The administration has failed embarrassingly when it comes to homeland security. Last week, the council's own Stephen Flynn awarded them three Ds or Fs and four Cs out of nine grades on homeland security. That's not good enough.

The administration has failed to create a culture of prevention within the FBI. Last December, the 9/11 Commission gave administration efforts at the FBI a C and said, unless there is improvement within a reasonable period of time, Congress will have to look at alternatives.

The FBI still has only 33 Arabic-speaking agents and none is assigned to counterterrorism.

The agency's top counterterrorism job has turned over six times in five years.

And we have yet to see the completion of reform in the intelligence community and the restoration of morale.

The 9/11 Commission package envisioned a director of national intelligence who actually directed the intelligence community. We don't have that. We're still living in a need-to-know culture instead of a need-to-share one.

The administration's supposed new standards on interrogation and torture have left our CIA personnel, and even our military unsure of what is legal to do, what they're authorized to do, what their country wants them to do.

During the Cuban missile crisis, President Kennedy had at his side Llewelyn Thompson, former ambassador to Moscow, who understood the Soviets and had even lived with Premier Khrushchev. We don't have that expertise any longer inside our government when it comes to the threats we face from Islamic extremism.

When we need to look beyond our intelligence community, as we did during the Cold War, we challenged a generation of universities and students to serve their country. We should do the same today. Learn the languages that we need. Understand the cultures of the societies where our biggest threats are incubating.

Our military commanders make a point of telling us we cannot win the war against terrorism through military means alone. As the new Army and Marine manual on counterinsurgency puts it: The best weapons for counterinsurgency do not shoot.

CLINTON: Pete said when he introduced me that I work as a member of the U.S. Joint Forces Command Transformation Advisory Group.

One of the common themes of our work there is that we don't have enough civilian capacity to manage pre- and post-crisis situations.

The world has changed, but our civilian institutions and preparation for public service have not kept up.

I recently introduced legislation, along with Senator Specter, to create a public service academy, a West Point for public service, that would send a message about the importance of civilian preparedness and re-sponse at home and abroad. It could become a place where we teach critical languages and put a high priority on learning about those cultures we so poorly understand today.

You know, finally, it comes down to whether we can win the war on terror, not just the battle. And that re-quires we face squarely our long-term challenge of putting the U.S. on the side of dignity and progress and making it clear that we do oppose tyranny and violations of human rights.

And in that fight, our only realistic weapons are our values and ideals.

We need to start by addressing the troubled conditions terrorists seek out.

I have focused on support for global education because I think it provides an alternative in places where the only schools are also incubators of religiously-fueled extremism. And it returns immediate health and social gains and reinforces our basic value of equality.

I introduced legislation for our country to take the lead in education for all, to aim at giving every child in the world access at least to primary education by 2015.

We've done a good job talking about democracy but we sure haven't done a comparable good job in pro-moting the long-term efforts that actually build institutions after the elections are over and the international monitors have gone home.

CLINTON: We have to give citizens more tools and we should be talking more about the successes of this administration, the relief efforts after the tsunami and the earthquake in Pakistan, the global AIDS program, the Millennium Challenge grants.

They're seldom emphasized and they often seem to run counter to the basic ideological argument the ad-ministration is making.

This month I was one of 34 members of the Senate to vote against President Bush's military commissions act. On the floor of the Senate, I recounted a choice that General George Washington made 230 years ago.

New York City and Long Island had been captured. Washington and the Continental Army had retreated across New Jersey to Pennsylvania, suffering tremendous casualties.

Here in New York, American prisoners, often held in the hulls of boats anchored in the harbor off of Brooklyn, were suffering unspeakably at the hands of the British.

The cause of American independence was in doubt.

Then Washington won the Battle of Trenton, capturing nearly 1,000 prisoners of war, and he had to decide what to do with them.

The order he gave should still speak to us: "Treat them with humanity and let them have no reason to complain of our copying the brutal example of the British army in their treatment of our unfortunate brethren."

America was born out of faith in certain basic principles and out of an understanding that it matters deeply -- in fact, it matters for our survival, that we hew to those principles at home and in the eyes of the world.

There can be no mercy for those who perpetrated 9/11 and other crimes against humanity, but we have to pursue justice in a way that lifts up our values, the rule of law and sets an example we can point to with pride, not shame.

That is an utterly realistic brand of idealism that has been with us since our beginnings.

The administration's experiment has failed. We cannot go backwards, we must go forward, building that new consensus and risking a new bipartisanship.

I cannot speak, of course, for the administration. But I know that my Democratic colleagues are ready to do so.

Thank you very much.

(APPLAUSE)

MODERATOR: Hillary, thank you very much.

You know, just before we came in, you and I began a conversation. You said maybe we ought to continue it a bit. And taking the prerogative of the (inaudible), let me reinitiate it with you, because I'd be very much interested in your reactions.

I've been around a long, long time, and I don't think I've ever seen a time in this country where there are so many long-term challenges defined by two or three criteria: number one, virtually all the experts from both parties agree on the magnitude and the existence of the problem; second, that all or most of them agree they're unsustainable; and yet, in spite of that, we do nothing about them. We seem dysfunctionally paralyzed.

I give you the entitlement problem, with its massive burdens on our kids in taxes and debts. I give you our current account deficit, which, if we continue at these levels, we end up looking a bit like a Third World country, with huge debt service.

I refer you to our health care problem, which, it seems to me, threatens to devour our resources and not have other resources we desperately need for research and development; our energy gluttony, that puts us in a position of both financing and making us even more vulnerable to some of our worst enemies and the related first-cousin, the environment.

So my question to you would be the following: Do you share my concern about our lack of response to these kinds of problems? And if so, what do we do about them? Is there some new approach or, B, is there a crisis that will be required?

And I know this is not directly related to foreign policy, but in a sense it very much is.

CLINTON: It is very much related to foreign policy because, in the absence of a strong American economy that is able to deal with the challenges that Pete have just mentioned, from health care to energy, we under-mine our leadership around the world; we are ceding our fiscal sovereignty as we speak because of our in-debtedness, our rather remarkable transformation to the world's biggest debtor nation.

So it is intimately related. And I share your concerns.

And to me it comes down to leadership.

Obviously, I think we do better when we have a bipartisan consensus, not only in foreign policy but in addressing some of these other issues.

And it requires, though, not only public sector leadership, but I would add it requires private sector leadership as well.

We need an American commitment, across the political spectrum but also from those who create the wealth, those who create the jobs, those who are globally knowledgeable about what we confront, to be part of speaking out for that kind of leadership and those solutions.

You know, I'm always amazed when I go back and look at what Truman and Marshall did after World War II to create the extraordinary commitment to rebuilding Japan and Germany, to investing in other people's freedoms in other parts of the world and the fight against communism at the beginning stages of the Cold War.

You know, can you imagine an American president today going and saying, "We've been taxing you at confiscatory rates for years now to fund this world war, we've sent you off to fight and die, we've seen the worst that humanity can do, and we're going to keep taxing you at confiscatory rates because we've got to go rebuild the enemies that we have just defeated"?

CLINTON: It would last, like, a nanosecond on talk radio.

(LAUGHTER)

And one of the reasons that it eventually succeeded is because Truman enlisted the business community to make the case. It was an idealistic and a realistic approach.

Realistically, we needed to try to have new markets and have a different outcome after the Second World War than we did after the first, and Germany in particular. But it was idealistic as well, that we could over time, with patience, develop democracy.

I feel that we're at a comparable period now. And I have, as you have heard and as you might guess, many specific critiques of the president's policies on both domestic and foreign issues.

But my biggest regret is that after 9/11, when the country was truly ready to follow wherever he led, he didn't tackle these problems. If the president had come to the Republican-dominated Congress after 9/11 and said, "We need an energy policy that puts us on a fast track toward at least less dependence," if not independence, which is quite a difficult goal, he would have gotten it.

If the president had come and said, "We've got to figure out how we're going to deal with this deficit, so I don't know what the future holds; we're going to have so many costs related to the war on terror; we need to take a deep breath here; no more tax cuts until we figure out where we are financially," this Congress would have done it. And he could have been re-elected in his second term with a very big majority.

Now, it would have required him turning away from some of the more radical ideological elements of his base, but he could have had a broad majority support across the country, and that hasn't happened.

And now we're going to have to figure out how to create it in, yes, a polarized, divided electorate. We're going to need leadership at all levels of government and, as I say, in the private and not-for-profit sector.

MODERATOR: Thank you.

Let's start here.

QUESTION: Senator, even though you spoke about the issues of North Korea, Iran, the Middle East, but with all these big issues we tend to forget our neighbors to the south. And I wanted to ask you questions on one specific one, which is Mexico, which is obviously very important to us.

And what are your views with this new government in Mexico, your views on the government, our relations with Mexico, the issue of the border, on the fence, and also the issue of the 12 million undocumented workers that we have here in the U.S.?

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

You're right, we have given short shrift to Latin America, and we are paying for it. And today I didn't talk about it, or didn't talk at length about China or Russia or what's happening in Africa, which I've very concerned about, with the collapse of a lot of these regimes and Islamists moving into the vacuum. There's a lot that we have on our plate that doesn't get into the headlines.

But specifically with Latin America -- and you know so well, having served as an ambassador in Chile -- that we have not been able to maintain the relationships that were nurtured during the '90s to support democracy, to support market economies. And people have been voting in a very clear message that they weren't benefiting from these policies and we were not really there trying to help them work better.

Mexico is such an important problem on our doorstep. I hope that the new government will have a concerted commitment to a jobs program to employ Mexicans. I mean, honestly, I wish they would go back and dust off the WPA. There is so much work to be done in Mexico, there is so much infrastructure. And it's a classic case of a very small, relatively small number of people reaping the benefits of the natural resources and the economic prosperity that doesn't trickle down.

And it is so unfortunate because Mexico right now is poised to have a tremendous forward movement with its economy and with its political and social structure.

I don't know what the new president will do. Obviously, the person running against him, Lopez Obrador, had a very different approach and was very outspoken and even quite confrontational about what should be done. It would be great politics and it would have lasting impact if this new so-called more conservative government would actually deal with the conditions on the ground in Mexico.

CLINTON: I heard just recently, in talking about the problems we have on our border, that hundreds of thousands of guest workers from Central America are brought into Mexico every year because they will work for less than the poor Mexicans will work for.

And, in effect, the Mexican government's policies are pushing migration north across our border.

And there can be no long-term resolution unless economic growth increases in Mexico and unless there is some commitment to its equitable distribution.

Very briefly, on immigration, I hope that we get back to comprehensive immigration reform.

We've had an unfortunate political season where the issue has been used as a political football.

There isn't any sensible approach except to do what we need to do, simultaneously: Secure our borders with technology, personnel, physical barriers if necessary in some places; and we need to have tougher employer sanctions; and we need to try to incentivize Mexico to do more; and we need to create the environment in which we get people out of the shadows and then give them some earned right to legalization that will enable them to continue to work.

If they've committed transgressions of whatever kind, they should be obviously deported.

But that won't stop it unless Mexico and their neighbors to the south actually let these hard-working people have a future in their own countries.

These are people who are willing to work but, for them, there is no future in where they came from.

And that is a problem that the governments of their country and we should be trying to address.

QUESTION: Senator, that was a brilliant speech.

CLINTON: I always call on my friends.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Where do you think we ought to go in respect of Cuba?

CLINTON: Well, I think we're in a waiting game. And I don't think there's anything that's going to change until we know what happens to Fidel. There's not going to be any changes on their side and there are not going to be changes on our side.

This is a very intractable political problem here in our country. I hope there will be some opening to try to figure out a more effective approach, to exercise more real influence by us into a post- Castro, but I think we're just in a holding pattern right now.

QUESTION: Sudan's President Bashir has rejected the Security Council's suggestion for a peacekeeping operation.

What do you think the right balance is between the responsibility to protect and the rights of sovereign states?

Under what circumstances would you support a humanitarian corridor and a non-consensual deployment to create safe havens?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I know how much you and the foundation have really been involved in this terrible issue. And I commend you for it. I don't know if Nick Kristof is here, but he had a terrific column about a couple of days ago, outlining a very detailed plan of action that I hope somebody in the State Department is reading.

CLINTON: I would support having a continuing presence with a high-level envoy that actually get back to the peace talks that fell apart with the rebel groups.

It was kind of like done on the fly. We weren't really that committed to it, from my observation. We made an agreement with a minor party and then we basically left and declared victory.

We're getting to be very good at declaring victory. That seems to be our PR strategy on nearly everything we deal with these days.

(LAUGHTER)

And we've got to get serious again about that. We've got to force the Sudanese, the government from Khartoum, to get back to the table.

I think we need to beef up peacekeeping forces, whether they're from the African Union or elsewhere in Chad, because this is spilling over into Chad. And I think we should consider some kind of humanitarian corridor.

Now, you know as well as anyone in this room -- and that's why I mentioned Russia and China pursuing their own interests; often at odds with global imperatives like nonproliferation and genocide in Darfur because the Chinese and the Russians are particularly allergic to any kind of internal intervention.

And that's why we need a different approach.

The work that Kofi Annan commissioned with the reform proposals that came out of the high-level group that was appointed -- there were some very good ideas in there that would be particularly applicable to this situation; most particularly, the responsibility to protect.

CLINTON: So I am open to taking much more vigorous action. But we are in a bind. And it gets back to Pete's point.

And I say this all the time as I travel around upstate because I think it's important for people to recognize, you know, because we're now the world's largest debtor nation, we have to hope, every morning, central bankers in Beijing and Tokyo and Seoul and Riyadh and everybody wake up and continue to buy our debt instruments. When it comes to trying to enforce trade agreements, to put the issue of currency manipulation on the table, or to deal with Darfur, we are now at a disadvantage.

You know, how do you get tough on your banker?

How do you try to create the leverage that is needed?

So it's not just in the direct areas that you can point to that we're not succeeding. It's in the atmosphere that has been created by the policy choices that have been made by the Congress and the president over the last six years that have given us a weakened hand. And I think that's very clear, in dealing with Darfur.

QUESTION: Currency at the U.N.: We have many, many resolutions and frustration by the international community, invoking Chapter 6, Chapter 7 sanctions, and there's just no response.

At the rate we are going, the strength of the U.N. is certainly going to be undermined, if it's not by now.

What is your vision for the United Nations and our relationship to the U.N.?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I'm glad you asked that because I alluded -- obviously, I didn't have time to go into any detail -- about what I see as a need for a process to begin where we try, seriously, to assess the international institutions that we have; obviously, the U.N. being foremost, but you can look at IMF, World Bank.

There's a group of them, most of which came into being after World War II in response to the Cold War and horrors of the war. And I believe very strongly that we need more multilateral and regional alliances; NATO being the clearest example of what's worked.

CLINTON: But it's taken a lot of tending and care. You don't just set these things up and expect them to do America's bidding. You've got to be involved, you have to be constantly trying to reform and revitalize them.

We don't have many tools in our current tool box to deal with rogue regimes, to try to bring pressure on an Iran or a North Korea.

And the United Nations, for all of its, you know, problems -- which are legion -- is basically captive to the Security Council when it comes to the really serious issues that we confront.

And if we don't have a better atmosphere in which to deal particularly with China and Russia on some of these intractable problems, you know, we could have the U.N. or not have the U.N., we're not going to make a difference.

And so I would like to see us, you know, take some of the steps that were recommended to try to reform and revitalize the United Nations. But I have no illusions that that will automatically answer everything that ails us.

I think we need to try to create a new level of responsible leadership among nations that are now assuming greater roles in the world like China, like Russia, like India. You know, they need to be part of us creating a new set of rules to guide us by.

And we're not there yet. And so I think that I support the United Nations because we have no alternative. When people criticize it or condemn it and then they turn around and ask that we get sanctions against somebody, it just shows you the contradiction, because we haven't yet grasped the reality that we need to rethink this, we need to have a greater level of commitment from some of the leading nations in order to deal with these problems.

And we don't have that right now. So the U.N. is basically what we've got. And I don't like seeing it de-meaned and denigrated, when we have to turn around and rely on it. I'd rather see us begin to try to put into place a process that could perhaps create some either different configurations or even new institutions, which I think are badly needed.

MODERATOR: We're a couple of minutes late, but there's been a young lady in the third row here that's been waiting a long time.

QUESTION: Thanks for the "young," Pete.

(LAUGHTER)

Senator, you're rarely in a room, probably, where as many people will go to the polls next week. My question is, I'm sure the comptroller of the state of New York has something to do with foreign policy. And since Pete said something that wasn't so foreign policy- ish...

(LAUGHTER)

... my question is: What would you advise, as a person who is on the ticket, we do when clearly the Republi-can is incompetent and everyone else has asked for the resignation of the Democrat?

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: Can we get back to talking about nuclear proliferation?

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

We are at a very difficult juncture because even if he were to resign tomorrow, there's no way to place a substitute on the ballot.

I do believe, with you, that the alternative is totally unqualified to manage the huge responsibilities of the pension fund and the investments that are within the jurisdiction of the comptroller.

There seems to be a commitment on the part of the soon-to-be new governor and legislative leadership that they will commence a process after the election -- you know, they couldn't get it done before the election, for obvious reasons -- but, after the election, to determine whether, if he succeeds in the elections, which I personally hope, because I think it's better than the alternative, whether he will at that point resign, whether he will be subjected to a process in the legislature, and if he's removed or if he resigns, then the new governor gets to appoint a qualified comptroller.

So look, this is not a pleasant situation for a lot of us who are friends of his. And I personally believe he did a lot of good things as comptroller. But he did something that was wrong. And it was not only wrong, it was, according to the state ethics probe, illegal. And, you know, you have to be held accountable for that.

And so I think that the process is as I've just described. So I'm voting for him. Chuck Schumer's voting for him. We think it's the better of some very bad alternatives.

MODERATOR: Hillary, thank you so much. I hope we don't have to wait three more years.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: Thank you all.

(APPLAUSE)

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY) HOLDS A MEDIA AVAILABILITY, 11/8/2006

(JOINED IN PROGRESS)

CLINTON: You know, becoming the first woman speaker is like breaking not the glass ceiling but the marble ceiling. There is a great inspiration there for everyone. She's making history, and now we're going to make progress under her leadership. And I look forward to working with her.

QUESTION: Do you think, if the Senate takes the majority, that it would make it more likely that a female would lead the Senate as majority leader?

CLINTON: I don't know about that. I think that we've got great Senate leadership. I believe that they have certainly earned the confidence of our caucus members. And I look forward to working with them in the next two years.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, what did you say about bringing more jobs to Western Europe? We just heard about the continental plan in (inaudible). It's going to be closing down in '09. We're losing over 300 jobs.

What can you say about 300 more jobs in this area?

CLINTON: You know, we need to re-invent the economy here. And we need to be looking for the jobs of the future. That's why I emphasized the biomedical area so strongly. I've worked on that very hard. Whether it's Memorial Hospital in Niagara, where I've worked to get them resources to create new services and bring new jobs there in the health care sector of here in Buffalo with the biomedical corridor and the bio-informatics center.

But we need this energy piece. This is a great opportunity for western New York.

You know, every 10 years or so, our economy has to be looking for the jobs that can't be moved somewhere else. We need those new, exciting, future-oriented jobs.

I believe we could create thousands of new jobs in New York if we were serious nationally about a new energy future. I am confident of that.

The president and the vice president have not seen it that way up until now. They basically had a policy where you just give Big Oil whatever you want.

That will not work. That's bad for the economy. That's bad for the environment. That's bad for our security.

Think of what we could do right here in western New York by growing crops that could be processed here for ethanol to be blended with gasoline that would put people to work in western New York and lower the cost of foreign oil and our addition on foreign oil. Think of what we could do, building on, you know, some of the new technologies, like I said the low-sulfur diesel engine that's being made at Cummings (ph) Engine in Jamestown. They're employing hundreds of people to do that. Or new fuel cell technology from hydrogen.

I get really excited about this because I think, from our border to Albany, we have all the ingredients and the assets to be the center of a new energy economy, right here in Upstate New York.

But it's not going to happen unless we get the right framework nationally. And that means we need a different energy policy.

The final thing I would say to that is I really believe it's one of the greatest things that can happen to western New York having Eliot Spitzer as our new governor, because he understands...

(APPLAUSE)

... that, you know, we've missed opportunities in the last 12 years.

You know, people as me all the time, why do I think that we haven't had the job growth here in western New York that you can see across the border in Ohio or in Pennsylvania or in New England? I mean, the climate's not any different really, you know? But the state governments in those states have been much smarter about how to incentivize new job growth.

And that's what I think Eliot Spitzer will do. So I'm thrilled to have a partner in Albany who I can really work with. He's going to put an office of the Empire State Development Corporation right here in Buffalo.

You know, I remember, when was it, two years ago? We all found out there was a chemical plant looking to possibly locate and create jobs in Niagara County and the Empire State Development Corporation didn't respond.

So we need to be on this, we need to be selling ourselves, we need to go around the world and let people know what we have here. I mean, I can go on and on.

I am a huge booster of western New York, because I think we have all the ingredients and I think now we're going to have the people in Albany that will really help us put it together.

QUESTION: If Mr. Webb wins in Virginia -- and he believes he has won...

CLINTON: Right.

QUESTION: ... that would mean the Democrats control both houses of Congress. What will this mean for America?

CLINTON: Well, it means that the Democrats have been given the chance to serve and lead our country. And I am very mindful that that imposes a heavy responsibility on us.

I want us to demonstrate the commitment to the issues that we have been talking about, produce results that people can see and feel and know are going to make their lives and their children's lives better. And I think you'll see that from the Democratic Party in both the House and the Senate.

We are going to stay focused like a laser beam on improving the economy, on shifting the weight of the government back to the side of the middle class and working families, you know? We're going to be looking at these areas of real opportunity like a new energy policy. We're going to raise the minimum wage, which hasn't been raised in 10 years for people,

(APPLAUSE)

I am very optimistic and very ready to take on my role in being part of a Democratic majority to produce those kinds of results for western New York and for our entire state and our country.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, there's a lot of speculation on whether or not you're going to run for the presidency in '08.

CLINTON: Really?

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Can you give the voters a realistic sense of whether or not they...

CLINTON: You know, I am today going around the state to say, "Thank you." That's what I'm doing, because I am so grateful. As Len (ph) said, look, people took a chance on me back in 2000. And I have done the best job I could every day to earn the trust of voters in our state.

And I'm just incredibly grateful and hopeful about having my contract renewed to be your senator. And I'm going to stay focused on that.

You know, as I said before the election, you know, people are talking to me about other ideas and alternatives all the time. But right now, today, I just want to say thank you. And that's why I came.

Thanks, everybody.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON MILITARY OPERATIONS IN IRAQ AND AFGHANISTAN, 11/15/2006

CLINTON: Well, thank you very much.

I have to say to both of you that I respect the difficult task you have coming before this committee and attempting to explain the situation in Iraq, which, by any metric that I'm aware of, is not improving.

CLINTON: In fact, the testimony to follow you, which will be in the next panel, particularly by Lieutenant General Maples from the Defense Intelligence Agency, very clearly sets out that the DIA assesses the conditions for further deterioration, and in fact lists how the overall attacks have gone up.

They're up in October, up on our soldiers, up on the Iraqi security forces, up on civilians. That the kind of benchmarks which Senator Nelson and Senator Chambliss and others of us have requested in the past just seemed to recede further and further on the horizon.

Hope is not a strategy. Hortatory talk about what the Iraqi government must do is getting old. I mean, I have heard over and over again: The government must do this, the Iraqi army must do that. Nobody disagrees with that. The brutal fact is, it is not happening.

And with respect to the kind of insurgency that we clearly are confronting, which in many ways is perhaps the most complicated that I'm certainly aware of as you go back and look at other counterinsurgencies, we don't have a military force that is creating a secure environment and we do not have a government that is putting forth political programs and reforms that engender confidence in the population to support the government rather than seeking security behind militias and other nongovernmental forces.

So from the perspective of those of us sitting on the other side of the table and on both sides of the aisle, what I've heard today is that, from General Abizaid, that all options are on the table but the Maliki government does not want more troops.

CLINTON: What I've also heard is that withdrawal by our troops would create even more disruption and sectarian violence but that a phased withdrawal, putting conditions that can be enforced by actions taken by the American government, which apparently are the only actions we have any control over, would not be a good idea.

So we're really left with very few strategic options and the continuation of hope on behalf of the Maliki government to take control of a situation that is deteriorating.

General Abizaid, one of the ideas that has been proposed by a number of different sources is some kind of partition.

Now, I understand the complexity of that, the difficulty of that. But is there any strategic argument to be made in favor of a partition that would at least give us territory that, along with the Kurds, for example, could be controlled?

That's the first question.

And, Ambassador Satterfield, the political decisions that have to be made keep being kicked down the road by the Maliki government. We've had testimony, now, for four years about what must be done. And it doesn't get done.

I see very little indication that there has been a resolution within the Iraqi government that they want the sectarian violence to cease because people are still jockeying for positions.

In such a conflict, it is unlikely to get to any political resolution until one or all sides decide that the killing should stop, that they're not going to get a greater advantage from pursuing violence than by pursuing political progress.

CLINTON: So with respect to partition, with respect to the political benchmarks, can you offer us more than the hope that the Iraqi government and the Iraqi army will step up to the task that confronts them; and give us, perhaps, more strategic benchmarks or conditions that we can look to, and set forth those conditions so that we can judge whether there's progress being made going forward?

SATTERFIELD: Senator, with respect to partition, I'd like to be very clear on this.

Partition in Iraq could only be achieved at an expense of human suffering and bloodshed and forced dislocation that would be both profound and wholly unacceptable, I believe, to the American people.

It is wholly unacceptable to this administration.

The mixed communities of Iraq are found throughout the country. There is no easy map that can be drawn, no easy political decision that can be taken, that would not involve death and suffering to achieve partition.

But more importantly than my views is that very, very few in Iraq wish to see partition as an outcome.

Even the Kurdish leadership, who enjoy a federal status within Iraq, don't want to see partition. They view that as a threat to their interests because of the instability that it would produce on their borders.

This is simply not an option. It is not a practical option; it's not a moral option.

With respect to your comments, which I respect, on the need for some greater degree of certainty, not hope -- and I agree with you, hope is not a strategy.

On moving the political process forward, we still believe Prime Minister Maliki is and is capable of being effectively a national leader. We still believe there is a sufficient degree of minimal convergence on the critical issues of ending sectarian fighting, confronting militias, dealing with Al Qaeda, to make our continued best assistance, best help, warranted.

SATTERFIELD: If that changes, then, of course, our basic assessment changes with it, but it continues to be our fundamental assumption.

CLINTON: General?

ABIZAID: Senator Clinton, I believe that partition is not viable for Iraq. I can't imagine in particular how a Sunni state could survive. I believe it would devolve into an area where Al Qaida would have safe haven, where they would export their terror to the surrounding countries. I believe that the Shia state would be decidedly subject to the domination of Iraq -- of Iran -- excuse me -- and that that would not be good for the region. It would start to move the region into Sunni-Shia tensions that the region hasn't seen for a long time.

With regard to hope not being a method, Senator, I agree with you, and I would also say that despair is not a method. And when I come to Washington I feel despair. When I'm in Iraq with my commanders, when I talk to our soldiers, when I talk to the Iraqi leadership, they are not despairing. They believe that they can move the country toward stability with our help. And I believe that.

This has been a very hard and difficult process, and over the length of time, we have learned some hard lessons. We haven't misled people. We have learned some hard lessons.

I believe that we can take the Iraqi armed forces, increase our level of commitment to them, continue to deliver the time type of security force that our current troop levels give us, and in the period of the next six months, clearly have a better understanding about the possibilities for success, but all of us that are involved in this thing believe we can be successful.

ABIZAID: It's not a matter of professional pride. It's a matter of seeing that the enemy can't win.

There will be some hard things on the horizon. We'll have to do something in Al Anbar Province. We'll have to commit forces to deal with the Jaish al-Mahdi. Each of those things will be battles in and of themselves that we can win if we set the right political and military conditions. And I sincerely believe we can do that.

CLINTON: Thank you.

NEWS CONFERENCE WITH SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY), 11/16/2006

NEWS CONFERENCE WITH SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY), SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA), AND SENATOR CHARLES SCHUMER (D-NY);

TOPIC: THE MINIMUM WAGE ALSO SPEAKING: LENNY JONES, CAM-PAIGN DIRECTOR, GIVE MISSOURIANS A RAISE; ALICIA RUSSELL, CHAIRWOMAN, ARIZONA ACORN POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEE; REVEREND PAUL SHERRY, COORDINATOR, LET JUSTICE ROLL LIV-ING WAGE CAMPAIGN; JOHN SWEENEY, PRESIDENT, AFL-CIO;

LOCATION: 430 DIRKSEN SENATE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. CLINTON (?): Five dollars -- (laughs) --

SEN. SCHUMER: Five dollars and 15 cents an hour. (Laughter.)

SEN. CLINTON (?): That's even worse!

SEN. SCHUMER: But guess what? You can't pay them $6.15 an hour either! (Applause.)

(Converses off mike with other senators.)

I'm involved in the issues. (Laughter.)

SEN. KENNEDY: Give Chuck a little -- (cheers, applause).

SEN. SCHUMER: The only fair wage -- it's not $5.15, it's not $6.15. We are going to bring this up to $7.25. (Cheers, applause). And we want to make sure when costs go up, the wage goes up! (Applause.)

So, ladies and gentlemen, I am so glad to be here with our great, great leader on this issue, and so many others, a beacon for fairness and justice, who now will be in the majority and can help America do the right thing, Senator Ted Kennedy! (Cheers, applause.)

And I am so glad to be here with my colleague and friend and partner in New York who has also stood for so many years for fairness and justice, Senator Hillary Clinton! (Cheers, applause.)

SEN. CLINTON: Are we ready to let justice rule?

AUDIENCE MEMBERS: Yes! (Applause.)

SEN. CLINTON: Are we ready to take this great victory that we had and translate it into actions for the working people of this country by raising the minimum wage?

AUDIENCE MEMBERS: Yes! (Applause.)

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you're ready and we're ready, and we've seen justice rule across this country state after state when they had a chance to vote, voted to raise the minimum wage! City after city has said we can't let people who work hard every day taking care of our children, taking care of our parents, cleaning up after us, serving us our food, making the products we need live in poverty when they're working full time. This is a matter of justice. This is a matter of economics because when there's more money in your pocket, you spend more money in your community, and that's good for everybody! (Cheers,

applause.)

We are so excited that the people of America have spoken. They knew what we were running on. They were not in any way mistaken. I went all over this country, and I said we've been trying to raise the minimum wage for nearly 10 years, and every time we try there's some excuse why we can't do it.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: That's right.

SEN. CLINTON: And you know, after a while you make the argument that it's smart for the bottom line, it creates more economic activity. You make the argument that it's the moral imperative to treat people with dignity who do the work that keeps our economy and society going. But we introduced a piece of legislation, Senator Kennedy and I did, which said, &"Okay. If you're not going to raise the minimum wage because it's the right thing to do and the smart thing to do, then no more congressional pay raises until you raise the minimum wage!&" (Cheers, applause.)

You know, we may meet -- we may not be tanned and rested, but we're ready! (Laughter.) We are ready! We've been working toward this moment for years. You know, my colleagues -- Senator Kennedy and my partner, Senator Schumer -- we have been working toward this day, and it is now coming. We couldn't have gotten here without your help, without the help of so many of you in this room and millions more across the country.

I want to thank SEIU and ACORN, who have led the fight. (Cheers, applause.) I want to thank AFT, who's here in great numbers! (Cheers, applause.) I want to thank fair-minded people across our country, and I especially want to thank and introduce from the AFL-CIO a great champion of working people, a wonderful friend, John Sweeney. (Cheers, applause.)

DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF THE SENATE HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON THE MINIMUM WAGE, 11/16/2006

CLINTON: Hello, everybody.

(APPLAUSE)

Are we ready to let justice roll?

AUDIENCE: Yes!

CLINTON: Are we ready to take this great victory that we had and translate it into action for the working people of this country by raising the minimum wage?

AUDIENCE: Yes!

CLINTON: You're ready and we're ready. And we've seen justice roll across this country.

U.S. SENATOR MICHAEL B. ENZI (R-WY) HOLDS A HEARING ON IMPROVING DRUG SAFETY, 11/16/2006

COMMITTEE: EDUCATION, LABOR AND PENSIONS COMMITTEE

SUBCOMMITTEE: SENATE HEALTH

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And it's wonderful to be here, and especially to see Sheila Burke. Welcome back to the Senate.

BURKE: Thank you.

CLINTON: I want to thank you for really embarking upon this important effort. And, you know, from my perspective, there couldn't be anything more critical that we turn our attention to. And I was able to get briefed on some of the questions and comments that were made before I arrived.

I want to ask the witness about something that I'm very concerned about, and we're talking about post-approval, but I believe strongly in comparative effectiveness studies. I was able to get that through an amendment into the Medicare Modernization Act.

And, you know, one of the first studies to be carried out under that provision was a systematic review of the Cox-2 drugs. And the results of the study, which were released in September, found no difference in the effectiveness of Cox-2 painkillers compared with over-the-counter pain-relieving drugs.

So I believe strongly that, as we're looking at how to modernize the FDA, how to provide it additional resources, additional statutory authority where appropriate, that we really look at these comparative effectiveness studies, because they complement the drug approval work of the FDA.

As we know, the agency's approval process focuses largely on ensuring that the drugs that come to market are safe for consumers; there's nothing more important than that, safe and efficacious. But newer drugs are not always better drugs, and they may not be the clinically appropriate choice for all patients with a given condition.

Comparative effectiveness studies allow us to determine the benefits of a range of treatments for certain conditions and to make sure that providers and patients are making treatment choices that, frankly, are not unduly influenced by direct-to-consumer advertising or other marketing efforts.

So I would like to see us use the so far quite promising results of the comparative effectiveness studies, through the Medicare Modernization Act amendment that I introduced and was approved. And I would like to ask our witness, you know, how she sees comparative effectiveness fitting into the, you know, pre-approval, post-approval almost spectrum of concerns that we should be constantly addressing as we move forward?

BURKE: Thank you, Senator. We, in fact, didn't as a committee look specifically at that question. Having said that, there is clear attention in our recommendations to the value in the FDA both partnering with the private sector as well as seeking partnerships with the VA, with Medicare, with other federal agencies that essentially have the ability to either sort out information, provide information, support studies either done with partnerships with either the industry or individually having the FDA seek out these kinds of studies, to inform them farther along in the process. Our particular attention to was that period largely just post-approval.

Having said that, we know that the lifecycle would produce lots of new information. The introduction of, you know, sort of new treatments, new opportunities will inform us about drugs on the market, as well as those coming on the market. And, again, we believe the agency ought to have the resources to be able to test those questions, either, again, through partnerships in the private sector, or individually with the companies, or individually through the agency having the resources to conduct its own studies or call for those studies.

So, clearly, the lifecycle, the point of that is, in fact, to inform us throughout that period of time where new information could well become available.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, I hope that, as we move forward, under your leadership and Chairman-to-be Kennedy's leadership, that that will be part of our consideration.

And I would underscore the point that has been made by a number of my colleagues, you know, that the FDA truly is the gold standard of drug-approval for the entire world, and we've got to get back to absolute scientific, impeccably independent judgment so that no one can second guess it.

You know, scientists may be wrong; we all know that. Research may not be complete or it may be in some way inadequate for the purposes for which it was intended, but we shouldn't be engaged in any political debates about whether other agendas, ideological or other agendas, are driving the decisions made at the FDA. And whatever we can do to guarantee the independence and the open scientific discourse that is needed as part of drug approval and review, I am certainly going to support strongly.

And I want to echo Senator Hatch's concern that we begin to look carefully at biologics, because this is an area of extraordinary complexity, and we just don't have, you know, the range of infrastructure, intellectual capital yet in the government to be a partner with the drug companies as they move forward.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I want to really thank and compliment this panel. I'm sorry that I had to step out and attend to some other business, but I'm very grateful to each of you.

Dr. Thomas, thank you for your last comments. I think that that's very helpful.

And, Ms. Thompson, you know, Elizabeth Glaser was a friend of mine, and I'm very pleased that you're here representing the foundation and that the foundation continues to play such an important role in public policy.

And, Dr. Nissen, thank you not only for your testimony, but for your courage. I appreciate you being on the end of the spear, as you say in your testimony, because we need you there, and you're stepping forward. And lending your expertise to this debate is absolutely essential.

And I also want to thank my friend, Greg Simon, for his continuing public service. And this FasterCures approach is one that I hope we can really see as a tremendous partner as we move forward in this.

And I particularly want to thank Jim Guest for being here. I'm proud that Consumers Union is based in Yonkers, New York. And I was delighted to go and visit their facilities and see all of the great work that is being done there. And, Jim, it's terrific that you're here.

And I want to also thank the families that you mentioned in your testimony for joining us today.

You know, as Jim noted, the problems of our drug safety system are not just abstract questions, studies and trials. Really, the failure to place concerns about safety above ideological or economic concerns has had an impact on the lives of Americans.

And as we continue to work on drug safety and broader FDA legislation next year, I think it will be important to give those impacted, such as the families you referenced, a voice in this debate, because we need to put a human face on it. We often get caught up in the statistics, and the dollars, and all of the complexity of legislative language, but this comes down to peoples' lives, to their well-being.

Jim, in your written testimony, you talk about the need for legislation that would establish a path for the approval of biogeneric drugs. You know, I think we have to look both at what we do with respect to biologicals from pharmaceutical as well as biogeneric. I mean, we're not doing a very good job on the former yet. We don't yet have a good partnership.

I visited a plant in my state that is, you know, one of the great leaders in biologics, in Syracuse, New York, Bristol-Myers Squibb, and, you know, they have concerns about where the expertise is going to come from inside the FDA to help them work on the biologics. And so we've got to simultaneously work on the biologics and the biogenics and try to understand what we have to do going forward.

I've introduced, along with Senator Schumer and Congressman Waxman, the Access to Life-Saving Medicine Act, a bill that would improve the FDA's ability to quickly bring comparable biogeneric products to the market, but I just want to say that word of caution: I don't think we've done a very good job on the biologics yet, either. So we can't do biogenics and not have done the good job on biologics that would make biogenics a, you know, comparable pathway.

But would you elaborate on the ways in which you think increasing access to biogenics could improve access to safe and appropriate treatments for patients?

GUEST: Well, let me first say I agree with you: It's both biologic and biogenics which are really complicated. And how to break through a process for responsible and timely review on both counts I think is important, and I certainly hope that there will be hearings and really serious consideration of your proposals on it. That's a whole new hearing almost and a whole new set of things to do it.

But, I mean, clearly the future of peoples' health is going to be significantly affected by biologics and biogenics. And, again, as an organization that's interested in consumer safety and consumer opportunity, I think that it's -- I think the emphasis that you're giving it is absolutely well-placed and would hope that the Congress would move forward on that front, as well.

CLINTON: Well, I thank you for that, and I think that, in addition, I mean, to what is clearly a complicated area, there are very few of us -- there are some, but I think there are very few of us in the Congress -- who really have the background in this complex, fast-moving area. We need quite a bit of, you know, discussion.

I would throw on the table another issue which I am increasingly, you know, having questions about, and that's the whole area of nanotechnology and the creation of these, you know, nano-devices and nano-elements. They are clearly part of the whole biologics effort. We don't really understand the impact on our health or environment of them.

I mean, we are truly on a new frontier, Mr. Chairman. We don't know. And I hope that, as we go forward, we will take the time to educate ourselves thoughtfully about these range of issues.

But the bottom line is: We need, as Dr. Thomas said, to make sure that the FDA remains the gold standard. We've got to give it the resources, the morale, the authority it needs, because we're on the brink of just extraordinary, breathtaking changes, and we're not even particularly well-equipped for what's already on the table.

So I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for holding this important hearing.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON THE NOMINATION OF ROBERT GATES TO BE U.S. SECRETARY OF DEFENSE, 12/5/2006

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And Mr. Chairman, it has been a privilege to serve on this committee under your leadership. I'm very grateful to you.

And Dr. Gates, thank you for your candor. That's something that has been sorely lacking from the current occupant in the position that you seek to hold.

Your candor to this committee, to the American people, and especially to our men and women in uniform, is crucial to our success. We need a strong secretary of defense -- but that doesn't mean strong-headed.

And I appreciate your openness and willingness to engage with this committee today.

Part of that candor was evident when you responded to Senator Levin's question about whether we are winning the war in Iraq, contrary to what your predecessor told us from that very chair and what the president has told the American people.

Can you tell us when and how you came to the conclusion that you expressed in your testimony, that we were not winning, a conclusion different from the president's?

GATES: I think that, frankly, if the president thought that the current tactics and strategy that we were employing were successful, he wouldn't be looking for fresh eyes and looking for new approaches and new tactics in our situation in Iraq.

GATES: I suppose that I came to that conclusion during my service on the Iraq Study Group, which was really the first time I'd had the opportunity to look at some of these circumstances in detail.

CLINTON: Well, you know, Dr. Gates, since the president made a statement as recently as October 25th that we were absolutely winning, many of us believe that the outcome of the election has triggered the willingness of the president to perhaps look at other options.

As you said in your testimony today, you don't believe there are any new ideas on Iraq; that we know what the options are, and it is incumbent upon us, our government, hopefully in consultation with the Congress, on a bipartisan basis, to find a path forward.

Now, with respect to the path forward, have you reviewed Secretary Rumsfeld's memo regarding possible policy options for changing course in Iraq?

GATES: I just read the version of it in the newspaper.

CLINTON: Do you agree with the analysis that appeared in the article that contained a copy of the memo that you've referred to?

GATES: It seemed to me that some of the options that Secretary Rumsfeld are exactly among those that need to be considered in considering the path forward.

CLINTON: You know, Dr. Gates, I've been honored to serve on this committee now for nearly four years. Many of the options that Secretary Rumsfeld put forward in that memo have been discussed in our committee deliberations.

CLINTON: They have been offered to administration witnesses as possible options. And yet there were no changes.

That strikes me as being very troubling, because now we're looking at the potential for a thorough review that will lead to changes that will be in America's interest, be in the interests of our men and women in uniform and, we hope, in the interests of the people of Iraq and the region.

Based on your experience, which goes back quite a ways in this town, do you believe the president, the vice president and the existing secretary of defense are intelligent men?

GATES: Yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: Are they patriotic?

GATES: Absolutely.

CLINTON: Do they care about our men and women in uniform?

GATES: Absolutely.

CLINTON: Do they believe the decisions they have made for the last five years have been in America's best interests?

GATES: I have not had that discussion with any of them, Senator.

CLINTON: Well if we...

GATES: I've heard that they believe that they were in the country's best interests.

CLINTON: So, therefore, we have this conundrum. We have a president and a vice president who will ultimately decide -- as the president is fond of saying, he is the decider -- about the direction to pursue going forward in Iraq. And it is quite frustrating to many of us to see the mistakes that have been made -- some of which you have enumerated -- and to wonder whether there is any change that will be pursued by the president.

Do you have an opinion as to how and when the process will occur that might lead to some changes in options and strategies?

GATES: My sense, Senator Clinton, is that this process is going to proceed with considerable urgency.

I would tell you that, if I'm confirmed, as soon as I'm sworn I intend to actually move very quickly in terms of the consultations with the commanders in the field and with the Chiefs and with others in terms of formulating my recommendations.

So I would say, certainly from my standpoint and, I think, also from the administration's, with considerable urgency.

CLINTON: Finally, let me ask you, Dr. Gates: In an oral history of the '91 Gulf War produced by the PBS program "Frontline," you made some very definite points about how the military often overstates, or even, in your words, exaggerates the level of forces required to accomplish a specific objective.

I'm concerned that's precisely the attitude that we've heard from Secretary Rumsfeld, former Deputy Secretary Wolfowitz and others, with regard to General Shinseki's recommendation and many in the uniform military, and civilian experts, who have consistently beat the drum that we don't have enough troops; we never had enough troops.

Therefore, how will you take that set of recommendations from your uniform military on board and figure out how you're going to assess it, given your previously stated position that it's often exaggerated when we look at missions to accomplish?

GATES: Senator, that statement was made in the context of the bureaucratic wars in Washington and the decision-making process, or the process of considering contingency planning in the Situation Room.

I would tell you that CIA also, in those same meetings, often would describe, very pessimistically, the prospects for covert actions that were being considered by an administration.

And, frankly, it's my experience that both the military and CIA take that kind of approach. Because sometimes they hear, as one of the earlier senators was -- I think it was perhaps Senator Warner, the chairman -- they hear some awfully strange ideas in the Situation Room, sometimes, from members of the National Security Council staff.

It was always my experience that, contrary to the conventional wisdom, it was the State Department that most often wanted to use force and the Department of Defense that most often wanted to use diplomacy. And CIA never wanted to use covert action. Everybody wanted everybody else to take the actions.

I think that, when the actual decisions came, though, the recommendations of the military were taken very seriously.

And I remember when President Bush, the first President Bush, was asking about the offensive strategy, once we had 200,000 troops in Saudi Arabia. And we were at a meeting in the Situation Room in the fall of 1990. And the military came in and briefed on what they felt they needed to eject Saddam and the Republican Guard from Iraq, from Kuwait.

GATES: And they went through a long list of things: moving the 7th Corps to the Middle East, six carrier battle groups, activating the Guard and Reserve. And I'll never forget, the president stood up and said, "You've got it. Let me know if you need more."

And I think that that kind of deference, when you get past the debate about what the policy should be, the great deference should be extended to the professionals who are going to have to carry out the action. And I think the first President Bush did that in the Gulf War, and that certainly would be my instinctus (sic) if I'm confirmed as secretary of defense.

CLINTON: That would certainly be welcome.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON THE IRAQ STUDY GROUP REPORT, 12/7/2006

COMMITTEE: SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

CLINTON: Thank you very much again, gentlemen, for your service to our country once again.

I think you can tell from the tenor and content of the questions that we're searching for the best way to implement a series of policies and actions that might possibly move us forward.

As I listen to you and as I reviewed the report, I'm basically hearing two overriding suggestions: one, that we have to engender the will and assist the capacity of the Iraqi government to take the political and economic actions necessary to stabilize itself.

And our biggest stick in order to do that is to make it clear we are not there unconditionally. We are not going to be baby-sitting a civil war. We are not going to take sides in sectarian violence.

Is that a correct statement, number one?

HAMILTON: I think it's a correct statement.

But it's not the only leverage we have -- the troop level. I think the conditionality of aid is another leverage. I also think, if you play it right, the regional diplomacy which Jim has been talking about can be used very effectively as a leverage on the Iraqi government.

HAMILTON: But you're right: We think you have to encourage that Iraqi government to act. And the military troop level is a very, very important part of that.

CLINTON: But let me follow up and ask about our own government. Because you have a series of recommendations that are quite -- both comprehensive and challenging.

The idea of a Goldwater-Nichols process that would get us where we need to be; that took decades. We know it was contentious. It made significant changes. We don't have time for that.

You've got other recommendations that talk about engaging the entire United States government, using all the tools at our disposal.

We've now heard from the Iraq Study Group, but we need the White House to become the Iraq results group. That is very frustrating for some of us. We don't understand the misjudgements and missteps that have been taken in the last years.

What advice can you give us as to the role that Congress can play to try to help create the conditions that our own government will muster both the will and capacity to act along the lines that you've recommended and that I think we in general agree need to be pursued?

BAKER: Senator Clinton, I think if the Congress were to -- in addition to praising this report, which many members of Congress have, and for which we are grateful, if the Congress could say, "This is a good basis for going forward and unifying the country behind a single approach to this difficult problem of Iraq," that would help, I think, the executive branch in its deliberations.

They just got the report yesterday, just like you just got it yesterday. And we've heard differing views here with respect to many of the recommendations.

If the Congress could come together behind supporting, let's say, utopianly, all of the recommendations in this report, that would do a lot toward moving things downtown, in my opinion.

HAMILTON: The Congress is a co-equal branch of government. I, frankly, am not that impressed with what the Congress has been able to do. I think the Congress has been extraordinary timid in its exercise of its constitutional responsibilities on the question of war-making and conducting war.

Now, the answers here are not easy. But in a word, I think very robust oversight is necessary. I think it's been lacking. I think it has not been a strong performance by the Congress.

And what can you do to most assure success of the policy? I would say very vigorous, robust oversight.

Many of the problems that you mentioned that have occurred that we did not examine because we thought it was out of our mandate I think could have been corrected with vigorous oversight.

CLINTON: Thank you.

"Today," NBC, 12/18/2006

Sen. CLINTON: Good morning, Meredith.

VIEIRA: I want to get to Hillary '08, but first I want to start with "It Takes a Village" '07...

Sen. CLINTON: OK.

VIEIRA: ...because this book came out 10 years ago...

Sen. CLINTON: Right.

VIEIRA: ...and a lot has happened in the past 10 years that makes it, I think, even more imperative that we will need a village to raise healthy, secure children. We've had the war in Iraq, 9/11, the impact of the Internet. What is the most important thing we can do as a nation to guarantee that our children are safe and secure?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, that's the question that I address in the forward to the book. When I wrote it 10 years ago, we had a lot of issues that we needed to deal with. We made progress on those, but we're going backwards now. Child poverty is up, more children are lacking health insurance. There is a sense of being overwhelmed. You know, as a--as a mom myself, I just can't imagine what it's like for young mothers trying to compete with the Internet and the mass media. It's like having, you know, another parent in the home that is...

VIEIRA: But if we're going backwards, then how do we stop that?

Sen. CLINTON: Right. Well, by, number one, realizing what's going on. Let's face reality. We've got to help parents do the hardest job in the world, which is to raise their children. And we need better policies to support parenting and families, and I'd like to see us put children back in the center of our national dialogue. You know, I've been in the Senate now for six years, and one question I ask myself as I try to figure out what is the right thing to do with these myriad of issues that I'm facing...

VIEIRA: Mm-hmm.

Sen. CLINTON: ...is: Is it good for our kids? And, you know, I try to be guided by that because at the end of the day there isn't anything more important than how we treat our children. And the idea of the village, it's a metaphor for society. You know, I was lucky when Chelsea was, you know, being raised by her father and me to have a lot of help, not just by people we knew--family members and teachers and doctors and others--but people we never would know, like police and firefighters and folks who had a direct impact on her upbringing.

VIEIRA: Speaking about the village, do you want to run the village? I mean, it's sort of--it's the elephant in this room, you know...

Sen. CLINTON: (Unintelligible)

VIEIRA: ...or maybe the donkey in this room, since we're talking about a Democratic nomination.

Sen. CLINTON: Right. Right.

VIEIRA: But everybody is talking about you and Senator Obama. Really--you're the cover of Newsweek. Most people have decided you are going to run. The senator from Illinois has said he's thinking about it. You've said you're thinking about it. This, to me, seems like a perfect opportunity for you, Senator, to tell us whether you've made a decision.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I'm working hard to make a decision, and I will after the first of the year. I mean, it is really both very flattering and overwhelming to be looking at this. Maybe more than anybody else, I know how hard this job is. I saw it in an up-close-and-personal way for eight years, and I worry that whoever the next president is, is going to face just a myriad of very difficult challenges. So I'm trying to approach this with a big dose of humility, number one, because it is going to be a hard job no matter who gets it. And number...

VIEIRA: But what's the first question you ask yourself? You say you're going to wait for the beginning of the--of the new year...

Sen. CLINTON: Right. Right.

VIEIRA: ...but that's only couple of weeks away.

Sen. CLINTON: Right.

VIEIRA: What's going to happen between now and then to make a decision?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, this is an intensely personal decision. You know, I'm very honored that people are urging me to run and saying they want to sign up, and yet, at the end of the day, I want to be sure that my decision is right for me, for my family, for my party, for my country.

VIEIRA: Are you leaning one way or another?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, you know, obviously I'm looking at it. I wouldn't be looking at it if I were totally uninterested.

VIEIRA: So you're leaning toward running then.

Sen. CLINTON: No, but I'm looking at it very hard. You're good, Meredith.

VIEIRA: So you got to lean where--you're definitely leaning to the left whatever way you're leaning...(unintelligible).

Sen. CLINTON: Yeah, that's right, I'm leaning right...(unintelligible)...left. I'm trying to be right here in the center.

VIEIRA: How much--how much of a say do your daughter and your husband have in all of this? How much do you take their feelings into consideration, their viewpoint?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think anybody takes their family into consideration. This is such a grueling endeavor that, if you undertake it, if you don't have your family on your side and really urging you on, you can't do this. It's too much.

VIEIRA: Why wouldn't you run for president? I mean, the polls indicate that if you did run you're the front-runner?

Sen. CLINTON: Right. Well, you know, I'm trying to weigh all the different factors, and, you know, one thing that I think is important is whoever the next president is has to hit the ground running. I mean, with all due respect to our current president, he has dug us into some very deep holes as a nation. You know, we've lost respect and admiration abroad, we have a huge deficit, we're having more and more people who are uninsured, we've got global climate change, energy dependence on dangerous parts of the world. We really need to face up with kind of honest optimism. You know, I've always believed Americans can do whatever we set our minds to. We just haven't been asked to do anything in the last six years.

VIEIRA: But a lot of people, Senator, think that you also represent the past, and that's one of the reasons why Barack Obama is so popular with people; they say he represents the future. He says, you know, unlike a lot of people, like you and me--`I'm not a baby boomer,' Obama says, `I'm younger. I want change.' And that electrifies people.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, he's terrific. You know, he's a friend and a colleague and I have a very high regard for him. Elections are always about the future, but that's up to the voters. People have to look at candidates, they have to weigh positions on issues. It's--really comes down to a gut feeling when you're looking at someone, especially someone who could be president and commander in chief, and that's what elections are about and campaigns are about.

VIEIRA: Do you think he would make a good president...

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think...

VIEIRA: ...given his experience, or lack thereof?

Sen. CLINTON: ...I think he's a--I think he is a, you know, really exciting personality and someone who has a lot to contribute to the national dialogue. We're blessed this year with the people who are thinking of running. You know, we just lost one excellent candidate when Senator Evan Bayh said he wasn't going to run. And, you know, I would love to see a wide-open race. Let as many people run on both sides because this country needs the kind of debate that, frankly, we haven't had in a long time.

VIEIRA: Speaking about debate, let's talk a little bit about Iraq. Senator Harry Reid said over the weekend--incoming Democratic majority leader--that he would support a temporary increase in troops in the Baghdad area, a temporary surge. The former Secretary of State Colin Powell says he's opposed to that. Where do you stand on that position? Do you believe we should send more troops into Iraq?

Sen. CLINTON: It depends, number one, what is the mission of those troops? I am not in favor of sending more troops to continue doing what our young men and women have been told to do--with the government of Iraq pulling the rug out from under them when they actually go after some of the bad guys. I am not in favor of doing that unless it's part of a larger plan. Everyone knows there is no military solution to the difficulties we face in Iraq. There has to be a broad-based, comprehensive approach that includes resolving some of the political issues, bringing the region together. I have an op-ed in The Wall Street Journal today, urging that they look at an oil trust, like what we did in Alaska when we found oil. Let every Iraqi share in the proceeds so that maybe they will feel a commitment to the future.

VIEIRA: But under some circumstances you would potentially support more troops in Iraq.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, let's see the plan. You know, I'm not going to believe this president again. I did that once. A lot of us did, and it hasn't turned out very well. So...

VIEIRA: And you've been criticized for that, Senator--and you know that this is not something that you haven't been subjected to before--by voting to give the president the authority to use force in Iraq if necessary. Some people feel that that was a mistake, that you made a mistake. Other senators who voted that way, like senators Kerry and Edwards, have said, 'We feel--we regret it. It was a mistake.' You refuse to say it was a mistake. Why?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, you know, obviously, it was wrong to believe this president. That's tragic to say because people's lives are at stake. He should have let the inspectors do their job. That was what...

VIEIRA: But were you wrong to take that vote, to make that vote?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, you know, you have to go and look at the situation as we knew it then, and I take responsibility for that vote. Obviously, if we knew then what we know now, there wouldn't have been a vote and I certainly wouldn't have voted that way.

VIEIRA: Senator Clinton, we have run out of time. When you plan to announce--hopefully she'll do it here.

We'll be right back after this.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you.

VIEIRA: Thank you so much.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you.

"Morning Edition," NPR, 12/19/2006

STEVE INSKEEP, host:

Have you concluded that American voters are ready to elect a woman president?

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Well, we won't know till we try.

INSKEEP: Hillary Clinton is not quite saying she will try, but she is saying it should be tried. The New York senator sat down in Manhattan yesterday, amidst speculation that she may run for president. She faces questions about whether a woman, or this particular woman, can win. And she said such questions should be decided in a campaign - by voters.

Sen. CLINTON: They get to take a measure of you. They get to decide whether they like your position on energy, or whether they like your hairstyle. I mean it's all fair game. So until a woman steps into that arena - and believe me, probably better than most, I know how brutal that arena is - but until somebody does that, we really won't know.

RENEE MONTAGNE, host:

The former first lady is giving a handful of interviews because she's putting out a book. It might offer clues to those who wonder what she would stand for as a candidate. She re-published "It Takes a Village." That's the book that she put out 10 years ago about the community's role in raising kids.

INSKEEP: She wrote it in 1996 after her party lost Congress, partly because of a disastrous national healthcare plan that Mrs. Clinton supervised. Ten years later, Democrats have just won back Congress and the nation is at war, but she still endorses her book's call for universal health coverage.

Sen. CLINTON: What's that old saying that, you know, good judgment comes from experience and experience comes from bad judgment. I learned a lot about how we have to do this. We have a partnership. We have to have the private sector onboard. We have to have everybody believing that the system, over the long run, will function better for them and not for somebody else. And I think we can do that now.

INSKEEP: You mean it's - what you've learned is just to approach it differently in a tactical sense?

Sen. CLINTON: No, I think strategic as well. I mean, the goal remains the same. I believe that it is absolutely unsustainable for the United States of America, the richest nation in the world, not to have quality, affordable, accessible healthcare available to every American.

INSKEEP: You also write about the way the world has changed since 9/11...

Sen. CLINTON: Right.

INSKEEP: ...since you published this book.

Sen. CLINTON: That's right.

INSKEEP: Is it fair to say that the changes since 9/11 have forced less attention on problems that you care about: education, healthcare, and so forth?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, it's fair to say that security is the number one problem we face, because we were attacked and we have people around the world, unfortunately, plotting against us as we speak. Unfortunately, we have only focused - and I believe in an inadequate way - on one of our problems in the last six years.

INSKEEP: Has the war in Iraq drained resources that could better have been spent on education or healthcare?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, the war in Iraq has certainly drained resources. And it's been very troubling that this administration doesn't even put the cost of the war into the budget, something that we intend to do, as Democrats, when the new Congress convenes. We have seen waste and we have failed to provide basic equipment to our young soldiers and Marines who go into harm's way on a daily basis.

INSKEEP: Does that cast your vote to authorize the conflict in a different light? That it's cost hundreds of billions of dollars and there are huge deficits, and that would be part of the reason?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, it's also cost thousands of lives and thousands more of injuries. You know, I've said repeatedly that, you know, had we known then what we know now, there never would have been a vote. I certainly wouldn't have given the president the authority. But I believed that putting inspectors back in, and allowing inspectors to determine once and for all whether Saddam Hussein, who had used weapons of mass destruction, still had them and still had the capability to deliver them, was a worthy effort.

Unfortunately, the president did not permit the inspectors to complete their job. If he had done so, we would have found what we found only after military action.

INSKEEP: In the Democratic Congress, are you going to be in a position to advocate for changes on a grand scale to anything, given the realities?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I believe we will advocate and we will finally have a forum to do so. Democrats will be able to put forward plans about universal healthcare coverage, about moving toward greater energy independence, about dealing with the threat of global climate change, about improving our education system. We have seen so much of the progress, to really make lasting change in our country, stalled or reversed in the last six years.

INSKEEP: But if you're going to put forward a plan on, say, universal healthcare, and also say we're going to pay as we go, and make sure that there's money to pay for whatever we propose, it's not going to work out.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, see, that's just not true. If we had been governed sensibly the last six years, with the balanced budget and the surplus, which this administration inherited, we would have been a long way down the road to deal with Social Security, and Medicare, and all of the financial challenges they pose.

You know, I believe America can confront any problem if we're willing to make some tough decisions. We've not been asked to make any tough decision. The president hasn't called for sacrifice from any of us. We're not asked to even turn the lights off and conserve energy, in order to limit the amount of money that is flowing to regimes that are antithetical to our interests.

INSKEEP: What's a tough sacrifice that you would call for, if you were in that office?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I believe, number one, we've got to get back to balancing the budget. That means we're going to have to cut spending, and we're going to have to take a hard look at these tax cuts that have not produced the revenues that were promised. You know, we have quite a long list of difficult decisions we're facing but we need leadership in order to begin the debate.

INSKEEP: Would you, if you were in that office, be saying in past wars the government raised taxes to pay for the war? And we're in a war, we should raise taxes to pay for the war.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I have repeatedly said we've never had a president who took us to war and cut taxes at the same time.

INSKEEP: But would you raise them?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I'm not sure you need to raise them. I think you need to prevent them from continuing to be cut and you also need to take a hard look at the ones that are about to expire. Everybody has got to pitch in.

INSKEEP: What would say to one of those people who's been telling pollsters, I know who Hillary Clinton is, I have an idea what I think Hillary Clinton stands for, and I don't like her or I don't like her as a presidential candidate?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I would say what I said to people in New York, who said the very same thing, let me introduce myself to you, really. You may think you know about me but I may be the most famous person you know very little about. There's just so much kibitzing about who I am, and what I believe, and what I've done. And I'd like to make sure the record is clear and then people can make their own judgment.

INSKEEP: I mean, obviously this is a brutal stage. New York can be a tough crowd.

(Soundbite of laughter)

Sen. CLINTON: Yes. Yes.

INSKEEP: As you know well. But I wonder if there are other parts of the country that would be an even tougher crowd for you.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, you know, I spent many wonderful years in Arkansas, grew up in Illinois. I have, you know, a lot of friends that, you know, I still see from my high school years. You know, the middle class out of which I came is being squeezed. If we don't hold together, if we don't believe in our values and ideals, then everybody's future is at risk.

INSKEEP: Well, Senator, thanks very much.

Sen. CLINTON: Good to talk with you.

INSKEEP: That's Senator Hillary Clinton of New York speaking yesterday. She has re-published her book "It Takes a Village" for its 10th anniversary.

MONTAGNE: Later today on ALL THINGS CONSIDERED, we'll ask if voters are ready to elect the first female president. This is NPR News.

"The Early Show," CBS, 1/17/2007

Meanwhile, the senator widely thought to be the Democratic presidential front-runner has made no announcement about her plans. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has just returned from a trip to Iraq and Afghanistan.

Senator, thank you very much for joining us this morning. Before...

Senator HILLARY CLINTON: Thank you, Harry.

SMITH: Before we get to Iraq and Afghanistan, very important subjects, real quickly, do you want to go ahead and announce your candidacy on our show this morning, just to get it out of the way?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Harry, if I do have something to say about that, I'll certainly come back. How's that for a deal?

SMITH: OK. All right, very good. And very quickly, your reaction to Barack Obama throwing his hat in the ring yesterday.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, it's terrific that we're going to have a very vigorous primary on both sides. You know, the country needs a national conversation about where we're headed and how we're going to get there. So I'm looking forward to a spirited and substantive debate about issues, about goals, about aspirations, about experience, about the kinds of things that voters will be interested in.

SMITH: I want to get to Iraq. This is really foremost on my mind this morning.

Sen. CLINTON: Yes.

SMITH: You're just back from Iraq and Afghanistan. You talked to the generals, you talked to Prime Minister al-Maliki. First, with the generals. Did you come back from this trip with any more faith that this troop buildup can, in fact, have an effect that the president hopes it will?

Sen. CLINTON: No, Harry. Based on my assessment in Iraq and talking with our troops, talking, obviously, with our generals, our civilian representatives, members of the Iraqi government, including Prime Minister Maliki, I am opposed to this escalation. I'll tell you what I'm for. I'm for capping the number of American troops as of January 1st. I am for imposing conditions on the Iraqi government by conditioning any further funding for the training of their military, for the protection of the leaders, for economic reconstruction assistance, on their fulfilling the political goals that we have expected of them. And there are numerous ones that have been called for, but the Bush administration has, frankly, failed to put any leverage on this government. I am for redeploying our troops out of Baghdad and eventually out of Iraq so that we can make sure that they're not in the midst of a civil war. And finally, I am for putting more troops in Afghanistan. This is the great missed opportunity that I fear we're going to stumble on because Afghanistan is, so far, quite a success story. Unfortunately, we don't have enough troops there.

SMITH: Right.

Sen. CLINTON: So instead of moving troops out of Afghanistan, which is one of the troop movements that would happen if the president's plan went forward, I believe that we should be putting troops into Afghanistan to be ready for what will be a spring offensive by the Taliban.

SMITH: Right. Because the record number--there are a record number of Taliban attacks in the last year, a record number of heroin sales. There really is jeopardy in Afghanistan. I want to go back to Iraq for a second, though, first. You met with Maliki. Maliki has said, 'I'm going to meet these benchmarks' before. He has failed to do so, and, quite frankly, the Iraqi army has not been given free rein to go after these death squads and members of the Mahdi army. Did you get any sense from the Maliki government that they were ready to actually do the hard work that needs to be done?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, we got lip service. But I think your assessment is correct. This is clearly an abdication of responsibility by this government, and we need some leverage on them. And I don't think putting more American troops into the midst of what is now a five-war front--you've got Sunni vs. Shia. You've got Shias fighting one another. You've got al-Qaeda involved. You've got so many different crosscurrents of battles going on. And the United States military is the best in the world. We know that. But we don't know that terrain, we don't know that language. Unless there is a total partnership with the Iraqi government and the Iraqi army, this can't work. And I didn't see the signs of that partnership. That's why I want to cap the troops. That's why I want to condition American aid to the Iraqis on their meeting political benchmarks. Enough of the talk. You know, we provide the protection for them, we provide the the equipping and resourcing and training for their army. You know, let's just say...

SMITH: `Time's up.'

Sen. CLINTON: ...we're not going to do that anymore. That's right.

SMITH: All right. Real quick then. I've got about 30 seconds left. The NATO commander has said he needs more troops. The American commanders have said, `We don't have enough people to do the job here.' Do you feel the progress that has been made in Afghanistan is literally in jeopardy without more US troops?

Sen. CLINTON: Absolutely. This spring is a make or break time. I would strongly urge--and Senator Bayh, who went on this trip with me, we're sending a letter to Secretary Gates today. I spoke to the White House yesterday. They need two additional infantry battalions in the south in order to take on this Taliban offensive.

SMITH: Mm-hmm.

Sen. CLINTON: And they certainly should not be moving an infantry battalion out of the east to Iraq, which is one of the reports that I've had. So...

SMITH: Right.

Sen. CLINTON: ...let's focus on Afghanistan and get it right. We still have a chance to do that. We have the support of the government. We have an Afghan national army that's performing well. And let's start getting tough on the Iraqis and begin redeploying our troops and putting pressure on them to meet their own benchmarks.

SMITH: Right. Senator Clinton, thank you so much for your time this morning. Do appreciate it. I assume we'll be talking again in the not too distant future.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you, Harry. It's good to talk to you.

SMITH: All right. Take care.

With more news, here's Russ Mitchell at the newsdesk.

RUSS MITCHELL, anchor:

Good morning, Harry, and good morning everyone.

"Today," NBC, 1/17/2007

MR. LAUER: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has just returned from a trip to Iraq.

Senator, good morning to you.

SEN. CLINTON: Good morning, Matt.

MR. LAUER: Based on what you saw, Senator, on the ground, based on what you heard from the troops who are serving there, what about this plan to send these additional troops to Iraq, in particular in Baghdad? Do you think the plan can work?

SEN. CLINTON: No. I'm opposed to it. I talked with a number of our troops, obviously our generals as well as our civilian representatives there and members of the Iraqi government, including the prime minister.

I do not think that this strategy has a very high level of success at all attached to it. In fact, I think that at best it's a holding pattern. I support putting a cap on the number of American troops as of January 1st. I support the beginning of a phased redeployment out of Baghdad and eventually out of Iraq completely. I also --

MR. LAUER: But Senator, if we don't send these additional troops in -- yesterday was a day of carnage in Iraq --

SEN. CLINTON: That's right.

MR. LAUER: -- over 100 people killed. The U.N. reports that last year 34,000 Iraqis lost their lives. If we don't suppress this sectarian violence and the insurgency, aren't we just going to see more of the same?

SEN. CLINTON: We're going to see it no matter what, Matt, because the Iraqi government is not committed to taking the steps, both militarily and politically, that would help them to gain control over Baghdad and other places in the country.

I propose putting conditions on the funding that we provide to the Iraqis. I don't think we should continue to fund the protection for the Iraqi government leaders or for the training and equipping of their army unless they meet certain conditions, including making the political compromises that have been called for now for more than two years. I see no evidence --

MR. LAUER: So when you say --

SEN. CLINTON: -- that they are about to do that.

MR. LAUER: When you say you're opposed to sending these troops in and you want to cap the number of troops, I mean, the troops are already on their way. They're heading there right now. Most Democrats have said they will not cut funding for troops on the ground.

So what exactly are you going to do? And what's the window you're willing to give the president to try this new strategy? At what point do you say, &"Enough's enough, Mr. President; now I will use the purse strings&""?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, the problem, of course, Matt, is that the president has enormous authority under our constitutional system to do exactly what he's doing. He does have the money already appropriated in the budget. But look at what decisions he's making. He's taking troops away from Afghanistan, where I think we need to be putting more troops, and sending them to Iraq on a mission that I think has a very limited, if any, chance for success.

We are doing nothing to change the dynamic with the Iraqi government. They're waiting us out. They intend to do everything they can to impose a particular brand of dominance over the Sunnis. And there's no reason for the Sunni insurgency, therefore, to stop. We need to have --

MR. LAUER: So when the U.S. military official said in Baghdad, quote, &"We are implementing a strategy to embolden a government that is actually part of the problem; we're being played like a pawn,&" you would agree with that?

SEN. CLINTON: I certainly would agree with that. And the other missing element of this, which the administration refuses to pursue, is any kind of regional conference. We need to get the political changes made within Iraq. And we are not putting any leverage on this government to do it.

I don't think begging a government that has shown no willingness to make tough decisions is a strategy. I think putting leverage on them and saying, &"You know what, we provide security for the members of this government; we're cutting funding for that; we're not going to fund an army that doesn't show up half the time, that is more aligned with their sectarian position than with the national identity,&" and I just have to reiterate, we could, with our attention focused on this strategy, which I think is a losing strategy, turn what has been a very positive development in Afghanistan to a loss. We're going to have a big Taliban offensive --

MR. LAUER: Right.

SEN. CLINTON: -- in the spring. We need more troops in Afghanistan. And today Senator Bayh and I have sent a letter to Secretary Gates saying that we need two additional infantry battalions in the south of Afghanistan --

MR. LAUER: Let me --

SEN. CLINTON: -- and don't take away a battalion out of the east of Afghanistan to send it to Iraq on this very bad mission that the president has engaged in.

MR. LAUER: Let me turn the corner, if you will, Senator, on a couple of things. Senator Barack Obama has announced he's opening an exploratory committee, basically the first step toward running for president. Is he completely qualified? He's been in the Senate for two years, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. Is he completely qualified to be commander in chief, in your opinion?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, Matt, we're going to have a really vigorous debate, I think on both sides, with both parties, in this primary season. And the voters will make these decisions. That's what's so great about our system.

MR. LAUER: But do you think he's qualified? I mean, he's a fellow Democrat. Would you be comfortable with him in the White House?

SEN. CLINTON: I'm going to let all of those decisions be sorted out by voters. You know, this is at the beginning of a long process, and we don't even know who all is going to be in it and what their positions are going to be. But what's good about this is we're going to have a real conversation in the country about, you know, what our goals are, how we frankly undo some of the damage that's been done by this administration, and get back on the right track.

MR. LAUER: We don't know who's going to be in it because some people are still sitting on the sidelines. When are you going to get off the sidelines?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I'll certainly come back and talk to you about that when a decision is made.

MR. LAUER: All right, Senator Hillary Clinton. Senator, thanks for your time this morning. I appreciate it.

SEN. CLINTON: Thanks, Matt.

"Good Morning America," ABC, 1/17/2007

MS. SAWYER: First thing, Senator, Barack Obama February the 10th is going to be go or no go. First reactions?

SEN. CANTWELL: Well, he's a talented individual. We're so glad to have him in our caucus. And he's a voice, I think, that is bringing a lot of fresh ideas. We obviously are going to have some very talented people, including the person right next to me.

We're so glad because, you know, when we have a woman who might be in the White House who could ascend to really bringing female leadership to a whole new level, that's exciting. And Barack is carrying a torch as well for breaking the glass ceiling. And it's a long way till the first primary, but I think we're very proud. We're certainly very proud of what Senator Clinton has done and achieved in the United States Senate.

MS. SAWYER: Senator Clinton, you're nodding. Anything else you want to say about Senator Obama?

SEN. CLINTON: I would agree with what Maria said. (Laughs.)

SEN. CANTWELL: Consensus building. We're consensus builders. (Laughter.)

MS. SAWYER: Do you believe that if there were more women presidents in the world, there would be less war? How sure are you that there would be less war? Do you think actually war would be --

SEN. FEINSTEIN: Not necessarily.

SEN. CANTWELL: Well, I think, Diane, women are agents of change. And while we're only 16 percent of the United States Senate, we are trying to make change. So it doesn't mean that you're going to predict the outcome, but it does mean that you will hear about collaboration, you will hear about cooperation, and you will hear about a format that I think brings people together.

(Cross talk.)

SEN. LANDRIEU: Well, I'm not certain that we would have less wars, but I'm certain there would be more collaboration. So while we can't prevent war, we can maybe extend the peace longer. Maybe we can bring it more readily. But we don't ever claim that we could, in power, end war. But I do think that women bring a different perspective on just how much is enough when it comes to bloodshed and expenditure of funds for weapons.

SEN. CLINTON: You know, Diane, I just got back from Iraq and Afghanistan. And in both places, in addition to meeting with our military leaders and the governmental officials from both countries, I met with groups of women. And women who are now in positions of responsibility in both governments now just begged for help from American women, particularly those of us in government; to give them some resources and support.

So I don't think that you can foresee or foreordain any particular outcome, but I do think what we're all saying is that there is, at least in our experience, more of an openness to process, to bring people together to the table, that collaboration and collegiality. And that in and of itself can cause positive results. Not that, you know, it's going to end all wars or something as hopeful and aspirational as that. So I do think there's some differences we could build on.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: I think women look at power differently, too.

SEN. CLINTON: Mm-hmm.

SEN. FEINSTEIN: I think men have a very, I was going to say, sort of upscale view of power, that it's got to really emanate from the top. And most women have gotten wherever we've gotten because of hard work -- doing your apprenticeship, earning your spurs, working your way up. It's a very different thing, so you intend to be much more inclusive.

SEN. COLLINS: But I don't want to leave the impression that a woman president wouldn't do what is necessary to defend this country. If Elizabeth Dole had been successful and had been president, I'm sure that she would have reacted very strongly and effectively to the attacks on our country on 9/11.

SEN. MCCASKILL: I want to point out this is a tough, tough group of women. Don't cross these women. (Chuckles.)

If you want to mess with America, if you want to do something that harms our country, I think that at the same time we talk about how we are good at finding common ground. And we care very much about collegiality. I don't want this interview to end with anyone being mistaken that, whether it be Hillary Clinton or any of these women, if the time comes and any of us have to make a tough decision that has to do with war or defending our country, every woman in this room is ready to do that because, believe me, if she got here, she's tough.

"Morning Edition," NPR, 1/17/2007

MR. INSKEEP: When Senator Barack Obama took a step toward running for president this week, many people immediately asked what that means for another Democrat -- Hillary Clinton. In a moment we will ask Senator Clinton herself. We will also be asking about Iraq. She's just back from Afghanistan, Pakistan and Baghdad and she has returned to the United States in the middle of a fierce debate over the war.

Senator Clinton is on the line from New York.

Good morning.

SEN. CLINTON: Good morning, Steve.

MR. INSKEEP: I understand you met the Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. What were you listening for?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I was listening for a level of commitment to securing Iraq by the Iraqi government and the Iraqi army and police force that has been missing. And I didn't hear that. I don't see where our putting in more American troops is likely to bring that about.

So what I came away with, Steve, is a very strong opposition to the president's plan for escalation. And instead, I would like to see us cap the number of American troops in Iraq at the level that we had as of January 1st and begin to deploy them out of Baghdad, and eventually out of Iraq.

I would like to see us condition further assistance to the Iraqis on their meetings of political milestones that have been called for for more than two years. They --

MR. INSKEEP: You're saying they would meet these milestones and then the U.S. would step up with more assistance?

SEN. CLINTON: No. No, I believe we have to tell them that we're not going to continue to fund their army and security for their leadership and reconstruction for their country unless they take steps necessary to have the political solutions that everyone knows have to be reached.

MR. INSKEEP: Do you think the Iraqi government really isn't trying hard enough, or are they being asked to do the impossible here?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think that there has been a lack of attention and focus on, you know, dealing with the problems that exist that keeps the Sunnis in an insurgency. And they have also refused to attempt the disarmament of the militias, which keep, you know, the death squads operating.

In thinking about this, there are some of my colleagues, as you know, who say, &"Cut off funding for American troops.&" I think is, you know, not appropriate at this time until we get more of our troops out of harm's way. And frankly, the president has the money to do this if we can't stop him. But I do think we should be saying that we're not going to continue to fund this Iraqi government and their army in the absence of their taking the political steps.

MR. INSKEEP: Senator, you've made it clear that you are opposed to the president's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq. The president said last night on Public Television that he does understand that some people disagree with him but, quote, &"If failure is not an option, what is your idea for success?&" Two-part statement there.

Do you agree that failure is not an option in Iraq?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, this is the kind of rhetoric we hear from the president all the time. You know, we do have vital national security interests in the region, but you know, a slogan is not a strategy.

MR. INSKEEP: Are you saying that withdrawal is an option, even if that would be seen by some as failure?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think that what I've called for for more than a year and a half is a phased redeployment that is tied to certain conditions being met by the Iraqis. I think you've got to get tougher on them!

You know, in this part of the world, unfortunately, the reality is that people respond to pressure and to threats. We have no -- we have not made any credible threats. You know, we are providing the security for the Iraqi government. I think that is leverage that we can use. We are --

MR. INSKEEP: And if I may ask about the president's other part of his statements here -- &"What is your idea for success?&", he asks. Are you saying that the idea is to leave it to the Iraqis to succeed or fail?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, Steve, we have put forth plans over the last several years. You know, when the Democrats voted for our phased redeployment plan we had in the political resolution and we had the redeployment of our troops tied to whether or not the Iraqi government performed.

It is not true that there are no alternatives. What is true is that this president is not interested in any alternatives. We have to protect our interests when it comes to al Qaeda and the Sunni insurgents who could follow us home. I totally agree with that, but what we're doing now is not working.

MR. INSKEEP: And one other quick question, Senator. As you know, Senator Barack Obama made news yesterday by taking a step toward a presidential run. As you consider what to do and when to do it, is there a reason for you to hold back from announcing?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, I am not influenced by anybody else's timeline. I'm trying to, you know, just pursue my own analysis and assessment.

MR. INSKEEP: What is it that you don't know?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, there's a lot involved in doing this effectively. And I'll be, you know, looking forward to talking about it in the future.

MR. INSKEEP: This spring, perhaps?

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.) Well, you're very good, but you know, I'm just going to go forward with my planning, Steve.

MR. INSKEEP: Senator Clinton, it's good to talk with you again.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you so much, Steve.

MR. INSKEEP: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"NewsHour with Jim Lehrer," PBS, 1/18/2007

MS. IFILL: Senator Clinton, welcome.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you very much.

MS. IFILL: There has been so much debate over the Iraq war in recent days. The president characterized it as expedited failure, the choices, versus slow failure, what had been happening before. And now there are -- there's all this action and reaction on the Hill.

You were there over this past weekend. Would you describe the war as perhaps already lost?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, Gwen, I think that certainly our strategy has not succeeded, and I don't think there's any doubt about that anywhere, including in the White House.

The question is, what do we do now going forward? And the president's proposal to add 21,500 troops in an escalation of the combat situation is not going to work.

In the absence of a comprehensive approach that tries to put some pressure on the Maliki government to do the kinds of actions, to create some political resolution, to deal with the oil revenues, to reverse the de-Ba'athification -- all of that has to be done, and so far there have been no consequences extracted from this government.

They get open-ended commitments from the Bush administration. You know, for more than a year-and-a-half, I've been in favor of phased redeployment of our troops, bringing them home as quickly as possible, but based on a comprehensive strategy that looked at the diplomatic, political and economic challenges, and, frankly, exerted some leverage on the Iraqis, who have to take these actions if any possible salvage can be made of this situation.

MS. IFILL: You talk about exerting leverage on the Iraqis. You met with Premier al-Maliki this weekend when you were there, and he gave an interview yesterday in which he said, &"Hey, if the Americans give us enough troops and give us enough armor, then we will be able to be done with them in three or six months, or at least we'll be able to take charge.&" Based on what you -- the kind of conversation you had with him, do you think that's possible?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, it certainly is what a number of members of his government, particularly the Shi'a representatives, want. They want the United States to get out of the way so they can try to exert what they view as their greater power, using their allies within the militias that are controlled by members of the parliament and the government, even unleashing the death squads, and, frankly, using elements of the Iraqi security forces who would be in favor of a sectarian outcome.

I returned from this visit -- my third -- and said, look, we have to cap the number of American troops, make it very clear we're not putting more American troops into this sectarian war. We, instead, are going to set forth one last time the actions we expect from the Maliki government. And instead of cutting funding for American troops -- which I do not support because still to this day we don't have all of the equipment, the armored humvees and the rest that our troops need -- instead of cutting funding to American troops, cut the funding to the Iraqi forces and to the security forces -- often private contractors -- that we pay for to protect the members of this government. We have to do something to get their attention in order to force them to deal with the political and the economic and the diplomatic pieces of the puzzle that confronts us.

MS. IFILL: Whether it's cutting support for the Iraqi forces or whether it's setting a cap on a number of U.S. troops in country, aren't you basically saying, U.S., get out of the way?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think that that should be the point that we make because they -- if you listen to what Prime Minister Maliki said, as you recounted, they want us to equip and provide the resources and firepower to the Iraqi forces. I say no. That will be a mistake because that will certainly produce a reaction from regional powers that are not going to sit idly by and see the sectarian forces, represented by the various Shi'a factions, be able -- with our help -- to go after the Sunnis. They will feel compelled to up their support for the Sunni insurgents in order to defend themselves. So I think we have to make it clear to the Maliki government you do not have a blank check with an open commitment here.

MS. IFILL: You and the president don't agree on much when it comes to the war in Iraq, but you both do seem to agree that there should not be a deadline, a timetable set. Why not?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think the timetable still remains problematic. You know, make no mistake about it; I'm for getting our forces home as soon as possible. But I do believe we have vital national security interests in Iraq.

You know, Al Anbar Province is the hotbed for the Sunni insurgency and for al Qaeda in Iraq. They weren't there before; they're there now. And we do have an interest in preventing them from basically having a foothold similar to what the al Qaeda and Taliban forces had under Taliban protection in Afghanistan.

I do think we have an interest in protecting the Kurds and providing some, you know, security for them.

I think we have an interest in preventing Iran from crossing the border for, you know, making it very difficult for us to function more broadly in the region.

So when people talk about deadlines and taking all the American troops out, I understand completely that, if you look at the carnage that happens every single day, if you analyze the, frankly, resistance to cooperation that we've seen in this government, it would be easy to say forget it, let them fight it out. But we still have to be careful because we are now facing dangers from Iraq that we didn't face before that we have to figure out how to contain.

MS. IFILL: You don't make the liberals in your party very happy when you stop short of calling for withdrawal. How do you speak to them about that?

SEN. CLINTON: In a very forthright way. You know, I represent 19 million people, all of whom have an opinion.

But we are in a very dangerous part of the world, and we face ongoing dangers from those who are, you know, out to kill Americans and undermine our allies and friends. So what I want to do, if I could wave a magic wand, would be to have this administration follow a number of the recommendations from the Iraqi (sic) Study Group.

A year-and-a-half ago, the Democrats, under the leadership of Carl Levin and Jack Reed, put forth a detailed proposal about the other factors besides military that needed to be taken into account. And once again, under bipartisan leadership, we have a resolution that we hope will lead to a majority vote in the Senate disapproving the president's policy. But if you read the entire proposal, it has a lot of wisdom about what we should be doing right now.

MS. IFILL: There are those who say that your evolution on the war has been, number one, behind the public curve and -- of opinion and, number two, right in line with your thinking on presidential aspirations. Is that so?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, obviously, I don't believe so. What I've tried to do as a consistent critic of what they have done in Iraq is to search for common ground.

I mean, I know very well the extensive authority any president has, and certainly this president has pushed it to the limits and even beyond. I think it's fair to say that he's already deploying the troops that he has called for in his new policy of escalation.

MS. IFILL: So why would a troop cap work, if that's true?

SEN. CLINTON: Because eventually we'll be able to get there. You know, it takes years sometimes, unfortunately, to change public opinion, which now has changed. The election was very clear about that. But it also takes time to change and put political pressure on presidents. And this particular president is especially dug in on his policies.

So I think that what we're putting forth now -- and, frankly, what I supported a year-and-a-half ago on phased redeployment -- was what we should have been doing then. But that required engaging with the neighbors in the area, and we have a president who won't talk to bad people. I don't understand that policy. I find it shortsighted and contrary to America's interests at home and abroad. But that's where he is. We've called for that.

I certainly have advocated for a different course from very near the beginning of this action. I'm going to continue to advocate for a different course, but that's what elections are for.

MS. IFILL: Well, and speaking of elections, 2008 looms. And I wonder to the degree to which you feel pressure, when you talk about the political pressure being brought to bear on this debate, whether you feel pressure from other aspiring Democrats, like John Edwards and Barack Obama, who right after you released your proposal yesterday released an identical one?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, my view on this is I have to do what I believe is right and what I think is responsible. Others will do what they choose to do.

But I think that we're in a very dangerous situation. And we have empowered Iran. We have put the Sunni regimes in the area in a very difficult position. We see what's happened with the rise of Hezbollah and Hamas.

I don't think that, you know, rhetoric or political positioning is what is needed. I think that we have to work our way through this. I just met with a group of Iraqi war veterans in my office, about 10 of them, each of whom told me why they have come to a position of, you know, opposing this escalation and their own experiences in combat in Iraq. And they understand the complexity of this. They, like me, want to stop this escalation in order to get this president's attention to begin to do some things that he's refused to do up until now.

MS. IFILL: The next election has a lot to do with the speed and the path of this debate. Do you think that there's any connection at all between 2008 aspirations, you or anyone else, and where this debate's going to go about Iraq?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I'll leave that to others to assess because I have been, as a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, you know, deeply involved in trying to fix what has been a disastrous policy.

At the end of the day, the American people are going to be faced with some very tough judgments because, at the current course this president is pursuing, I'm afraid that the next president will inherit this situation, with all of its complexity and all of its heartbreak. And I believe that it's important that we try to forge a bipartisan consensus here in the Senate, disapproving this escalation as the very first step we take, and then move forward, using the appropriations process and the authorization process -- which is kind of, you know, congressional speak for trying to put some limits and force some changes on the administration.

And let's not kid ourselves; I think this administration is also focused on Iran. And I think we need to send a very strong message that an administration with its track record of failure, of arrogance, of refusal to listen and learn from the disastrous steps that have, unfortunately, been taken should not be rushing off and putting American, you know, service members in harm's way and possibly widening the conflict.

So there's a lot that we have to worry about.

MS. IFILL: Senator Clinton, thank you very much for joining us.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you, Gwen.

"This Week at War," CNN, 1/20/2007

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

ROBERTS: We're breaking away from the studio portion of our show for a segment out here to Scottsdale, Arizona, where our CNN warrior one Hummer is being auctioned off with the proceeds going to Fisher House because of some very big news that's breaking. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has announced she's forming an exploratory committee to examine a run for president. She made the announcement on her website.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D) NEW YORK: Let's talk about how to bring the right end to the war in Iraq and to restore respect for America around the world.

ROBERTS: Hillary Clinton made that announcement just days after returning from her third visit to Iraq. On Thursday she invited me over to her offices to talk about that. I asked her what her impressions of the war were this time around.

CLINTON: This time, there's been just a steady diet of bad news and setbacks, mistakes and problems and that was apparent. There is very little faith that this latest proposal by the president in and of itself, without all the other aspects of a comprehensive approach that many of us have advocated for, is likely to be successful. So as a result, many of us are trying to figure out how we can finally influence the president to change direction and choose a different course.

ROBERTS: You met with Nuri al Maliki, the prime minister. Do you have any faith that he is the guy who can bring Iraq back to a state of security?

CLINTON: I don't have any faith.

ROBERTS: No faith in al Maliki

CLINTON: Whether there's a gap between his intentions and his will and capacity is the real problem or whether he's doing what he intends to do, through mark time and further the, you know, the dominance of his sectarian supporters, it's hard to tell. So you know, there's a mixed message at best, and I think that's what the Bush administration has never come to grips with.

ROBERTS: The proposal that you articulated on Wednesday appears to really finally thread a needle here. You want to put a cap on the number of troops, but you're staying away from this issue of funding, which, if you were to run for president, could be something that comes back to haunt you.

CLINTON: Well, that's not the way I think about it. What I'm trying to do is to figure out what are our points of leverage on the Maliki government and frankly, on our own government. So what I try to do is to say look, let's not put more troops in. Let's cap the number of troops we have right now and let's begin the phased redeployment that I've called for, for more than a year and a half. At the same time, I am not prepared to vote to cut funding to American troops. So why don't we tell the Maliki regime that we will cut funding to their forces, including the private security forces that provide the security for members of that government, if they don't start demonstrating a willingness and a capacity to do what we all know needs to be done.

ROBERTS: The White House didn't like your plan very much. Here's what White House spokesman Tony Snow said about that on Wednesday.

TONY SNOW, WHITE HOUSE PRESS SECRETARY: It binds the hands of the commander in chief and also the generals and frankly also the troops on the ground, in terms of responding to situations and contingencies that may occur there. To tie one's hand in the time of war is a pretty extreme move.

ROBERTS: If you were commander in chief, would you accept this plan or would you feel it was tying your hands?

CLINTON: Other presidents have. You know, troop caps have been used, most recently in Colombia, where both the Democratic and Republican president have accepted limits on troops that could be sent to Colombia. I am not advocating a date certain and immediate withdrawal from Iraq. I certainly want to bring our troops home as soon as possible, but I accept the fact that we have vital national security interests in Iraq. So you know, I obviously believe that you know, there needs to be escape valves in proposals like this. Everybody who is reasonable assumes that. We're trying to get this president's attention. They have been impervious to evidence and the facts on the ground. It took years to, you know, finally get their attention, to even have them admit they've made mistakes.

ROBERTS: On the subject of mistakes, your 2002 vote to authorize the war, was that a mistake? Do you regret it?

CLINTON: I've said that I regret the way the president uses, used the authority that he was given, and certainly, if we knew then what we know now, there would never have been a vote and I wouldn't have voted for it. I take responsibility for that.

ROBERTS: Was it a mistake to vote for it? CLINTON: I know people are all hung up on the words here. I think it's very clear that, if we had known then what we know now, the president would never have been able to come to the Congress and ask for a vote. I believe that, you know, the case that was made then, which I saw as a way of checking Saddam Hussein, the sanctions regime was falling apart, putting inspectors in made sense. I said at the time I was not in favor of a pre-emptive war, and you know, I don't think you get do-overs in life. I think you take responsibility for the decisions that you make and you try to make the situation better, which is what I've been trying to do consistently.

ROBERTS: With respect, if there's a knock on you, it's that you're too cautious when it comes to the Iraq war that your positions appear more political than they do genuine.

CLINTON: Well, you know, I obviously don't think that's fair. I mean, I think there is a role for politics. That's what being in the Senate is all about, but I've been a consistent, persistent critic of the way this president has conducted the war, of his secretary of defense, of many of the decisions that have been made. I've tried to be responsible. I think that is important. It's very easy to engage in, you know, heated rhetoric and make all kinds of claims, but that's not me. That's not what I intend to do, regardless of what the politics might be. I'm going to say what I believe. I'm going to take the positions that I think are right at the time. I'm going to look for ways to try to make a bad situation better. I think that's the responsible course to take.

ROBERTS: Senator Hillary Clinton, just one of many voices rising in opposition to President Bush's new plan for Iraq as he prepares to give his state of the union address on Tuesday.

"Weekend All Things Considered," NPR, 1/21/2007

Mr. CHIVIAN: Hello, this is my friend Richard...

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Hi. How are you?

MARTIN: They've spotted Senator Hillary Clinton finishing up a breakfast meeting in a booth in the back. It's an opportunity the men can't pass up.

Senator CLINTON: Well, I have followed what you have done...

Mr. CIZIK: Thank you. Thank you.

Senator CLINTON: ...with admiration and interest.

Mr. CIZIK: Thank you.

Senator CLINTON: Yes, it's so exciting.

Mr. CIZIK: Well, we're counting on you to champion this. We know you will.

Senator CLINTON: I certainly will.

"ABC News Now/Special Report," ABC, 1/22/2007

(Voiceover) We wanna take you to a live event happening at Ground Zero here in New York City, where Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and other New York politicians are calling for better health care treatment for 9/11 responders. Let's listen in.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

We now have Caesar's father, an NYPD officer at Mount Sinai Hospital, fighting for his life because of pulmonary fibrosis, a disease that we believe has already taken the lives of four other NYPD officers. This is a call to action. I've spoken with the White House at length, encouraging them to put in to the President's budget money to continue the treatment program that has now started. Without the President's budget commitment, the program that is treating many of these victims will end. It will end this summer. The treatment that has finally begun will be stopped.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

So first and foremost, we have to have the money from the federal government to continue treating those who are now being treated. And then, we need the additional resources that I have asked with with my colleagues, Congressman Nadler, Congressman Maloney, Congressman Fossella, Senator Schumer, and others, that we establish a means of providing treatment for all of the victims going forward. I've introduced legislation with Senator Schumer and Senator Kennedy, who now chairs the committee, that this would go through, for one point, $9 billion.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

That money would be used for the medical treatments that people like Caesar's father needs. In speaking with medical experts, it is absolutely clear that many of these victims will only survive if they are given lung transplants. And many of them become too sick with opportunistic infections to be able even to get the lung transplant. And so there is a lot of medical work, the prescriptions that are needed, to keep people going, the medical interventions that are required. I believe this is a moral responsibility of our nation. We owe it to these responders, the residents and others who were sickened because of the attack on our country. So we have a united New York team. We're going back to Washington.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK) (CONTINUED)

Many of the people you see, in addition to Joe and, and Caesar and John and Marvin and other victims, will be there, will be walking the halls of Congress, will be buttonholing members of Congress, both in the House and the Senate, will be doing more media down there because this is a crisis, and we need for the President to respond to help us. So I thank my colleagues once again, but particularly, I thank and salute all the advocates, all of the unions that made this happen. And I see representatives from so many of them, all of the residents groups that kept the fight going, all of the medical experts who have been treating the victims, and whose voices are now, you know, the ones that should be listened to.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

And we appeal to the city to end its resistance to taking care of people who took care of us. And we appeal to the federal government to provide the funding that is needed to make sure everyone of these men and women get the treatment they deserve to have. Thank you very much.

"CBS Evening News," CBS, 1/22/2007

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democratic Presidential Candidate): Well, Katie, I am opposed to the escalation that the president has proposed. Unfortunately, the fact is he is carrying out the policy. He already had in motion the movement of troops into Iraq. What we're trying to do is send a bipartisan message, if possible, that we disapprove of this escalation, that we want to begin the phase redeployment that I've called for for more than a year and a half that we want to get our troops home as soon as possible.

COURIC: Let's talk about your candidacy. There are some people who say another Clinton administration, even if it's a different Clinton, will feel eerily like Groundhog Day. What would you say to them?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I could go on for a long time about all the good things that were done for the country and America's position in the world during the eight years of my husband's administration. And I would like to get back to building on what works but recommending the kind of bold but practical changes like universal health care, like energy independence, that were not possible in the first Clinton administration.

COURIC: In fact, some might say, Senator, that was a disaster when you headed that very committee.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, some might say that we were not successful. And I'd be the first to say that. But who better to try to advocate than someone who's learned the lessons of how difficult it will be. Every day now we have business leaders and union leaders and other important representatives from different groups in our country coming forward and saying we've got to change. We've had Massachusetts, now California and other states stepping up. So I think the timing is right. And I, probably more than anybody, know how best to navigate the treacherous waters that lie ahead.

COURIC: Senator Clinton, even those who approve of you as a candidate have questions about your electability, some of those people. What would you say to them?

Sen. CLINTON: I would say, give me a chance. As a friend of mine said the other day, I'm the most famous woman that nobody really knows. Because I've been, you know, caricaturized to some extent. And I want to let people make their own decisions. And I think that I can do that as I have here in our state.

COURIC: And what would you say to those who feel Barack Obama is a breath of fresh air after nearly 20 years of Clintons and Bushes?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, there is no doubt. He's an extraordinarily talented person. And I'm pleased we have such a talented field. I think we're going to have a great debate. As I said when I launched on Saturday, let the conversation begin. Because I think through that conversation we'll be able to chart the best course for our country.

COURIC: Senator Hillary Clinton, thank you very much.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you, Katie.

"NBC Nightly News," NBC, 1/22/2007

NBC News IN DEPTH tonight, a woman who lived in the White House for eight years. She is trying to become the second US president named Clinton. Earlier today New York senator and former first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton came here as part of a big media tour to talk about her announcement this weekend that she's in the race for president to win it.

This is not exactly how or when you planned to announce this. How else are you going to have to adjust to counter the presence of this Obama campaign, which is a surprise?

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: Well, you know, Brian, this is exactly how I intended to do this. Once I made up my mind that I was going to contest for the presidential nomination of my party, I wanted to do it on the Web. I wanted to do it before the president's State of the Union, because I wanted to draw the contrast between what we've seen over the last six years and the kind of leadership and experience that I would bring to the office.

WILLIAMS: So you had always planned to announce before the president's State of the Union address?

Sen. CLINTON: That was our plan, yes.

WILLIAMS: What does the Obama factor do to the Clinton campaign?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, it makes everything even more exciting. I've been through presidential campaigns, and this is going to be one of the best we've had in a long time because there is no sitting vice president. There's no clear heir apparent. We have a terrific, talented field on the Democratic side, and obviously Barack is just a phenomenally accomplished senator and person who's going to be very effective, as are a number of my other competitors. I know everybody and they bring a lot of different skills and talents to this field, and I'm looking forward to the election.

WILLIAMS: Is it any kind of a burden for you, Senator, that so many opinions are pre-formed? Americans know Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, as someone close to me once said, I'm probably the most famous person you don't really know and I'm going to spend my time doing what I've done in New York, which is going and meeting with groups of people and talking about what I value, my background, my incredibly committed views about what we should be doing in our country, and let people make their own judgments. Because I heard the very same kinds of comments when I started running here in New York, that people, you know, thought they'd already made up their minds about me. And I just wanted a fair shot. I wanted people to judge me for who I really am and what I really believe, and I think I can do well if I get that opportunity.

WILLIAMS: Well, you're one of the few alive who has seen exactly the journey that is ahead of you. I don't know if that helps or hurts.

Sen. CLINTON: It helps a lot. I don't think I'll have too many surprises coming forward.

WILLIAMS: Our conversation in this room earlier with senator and now candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton earlier today.

When NBC NIGHTLY NEWS continues after another break, just when you thought it was safe to go back to your e-mail, spam has come roaring back and in a big way.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON DELIVERS REMARKS ON POST-9/11 HEALTH CARE, 1/22/2007

CLINTON: Thank you all.

This is an issue that demands attention from the president and the Congress now. We have worked for years to get the money we needed to provide the monitoring that gave us the data that we now are relying on to make the case that we have to provide treatment for all of the victims of 9/11.

Thousands and thousands of first responders, of residents and others were made sick because of this act of war, this attack upon our country.

You see some of them before you today. I spent, I guess, about an hour and a half with Joseph Zadroga, his wife Linda, and their beautiful little granddaughter Tylerann. We went over all of the anguish that their son James, an NYPD detective, faced when he became sick; the difficulty he had getting the city to accept responsibility for that illness.

We now have Cesar's father, an NYPD officer at Mount Sinai hospital, fighting for his life because of pulmonary fibrosis, a disease that we believe has already taken the lives of four other NYPD officers.

This is a call to action. I've spoken with the White House at length, encouraging them to put into the president's budget money to continue the treatment program that has now started.

Without the president's budget commitment, the program that is treating many of these victims will end. It will end this summer. The treatment that has finally begun will be stopped.

So, first and foremost, we have to have the money from the federal government to continue treating those who are now being treated. And then we need the additional resources that I have asked with with my colleagues -- Congressman Nadler, Congresswoman Maloney, Congressman Fossella, Senator Schumer and others -- that we establish a means of providing treatment for all of the victims going forward.

I've introduced legislation with Senator Schumer and Senator Kennedy -- who now chairs the committee that this would go through -- for $1.9 billion. That money would be used for the medical treatments that people like Cesar's father need.

In speaking with medical experts, it is absolutely clear that many of these victims will only survive if they are given lung transplants. And many of them become too sick with opportunistic infections to be able, even, to get the lung transplant.

And so there is a lot of medical work; the prescriptions that are needed to keep people going; the medical interventions that are required.

Thank you very much.

"ABC News Now/Special Report," ABC, 1/23/2007

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

...places great importance on building up internal institutions and training to provide security. This escalation, despite the rhetoric about other goals, places primary emphasis on American military involvement not Iraqi institutions. The manual makes clear the interconnections of political and military progress that one cannot be achieved without the other. I've been quite gratified to hear all of the positive references to Bosnia in this hearing. I can remember very well in 2001 and 2002, hearing nothing but derision about nation building and about peacekeeping and about sufficient levels of force going in to back up whatever the political objectives might be.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

You will take on a difficult role in Iraq at a time peril based on your leadership and expertise. But what those of us who are issuing resolutions and statements of disapproval fear is that you - are being sent to administer a policy that frankly does not reflect your experience or advice, or the experience and advice of our most recent example in dealing with ethnic violence, namely, Bosnia. You wrote the book, General, but the policy is not by the book. And you are being asked to square the circle, to find a military solution to a political crisis.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

I, among others on this committee, have put forward ideas about disapproving the escalation not because we, in any way, embrace failure or defeat but because we are trying to get the attention of our government and the government of Iraq. On my recent trip to Iraq, along with Senator Bayh, our interaction with the Prime Minister and his team did not inspire confidence. What I, speaking for myself, am attempting to do is to send a very clear message to the Iraqi government that they cannot rely on the blood and treasure of America any longer, that we are not going to go into Baghdad and embed our young men and women in very dangerous neighborhoods where we cannot possibly provide force protection because they won't step up and do what everyone knows they must do for themselves.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK) (CONTINUED)

So I very sincerely but wholeheartedly disagree with those who are trying to once again up the rhetoric about our position in Iraq instead of taking a hard look about what will actually, on the ground, change the behavior and actions of this Iraqi government. In the absence of the kind of political full court press that we've put on in Bosnia, when I landed in (inaudible), I was briefed by Russians, French, Germans and Americans. We had an international force. We had an international commitment. We had brought people to the point where they understood that success there was essential to their national security. I see nothing coming from this administration that it is willing to pursue such a policy now.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

They won't talk to bad people, and it is bad people you talk to in order to try to further political goals, not your friends. They will not put the kind of pressure on a consistent basis on the government that is required in order to change their behavior. So I have said that, you know, I would never cut - money for our troops when they are in harm's way, but I sure would threaten to cut money for the Iraqi troops, and for the security for the Iraqi leadership. I don't know how else to get their attention. But one thing I'm particularly concerned about is the failure of security for our troops, the incident in Karbalah over the weekend is scary. It raises questions that we don't have answers to.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

So let me, beyond my statement of joining in the comments with Senator Collins, and rejecting those of our other friends on the panel who think that statements of disapproval are somehow going to undermine our effort when it think they will send the clearest message. We know this policy is going forward. We know the troops are moving. We know that we're not likely to stop this escalation. But we are gonna do everything we can to send a message to our government and the Iraqi government that they had better change because the enemy we are confronting is adaptable. It is intelligent. It learns.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

It got a hold of our military uniforms, went through those gates after having cleared all those police checkpoints, killed five of our soldiers in a meeting, talking about security in Iraq. So I don't believe that we are playing with a team on the other side that understands the stakes as we describe them. So one thing I would ask, General, is please do everything you can to get additional security. The Humvees are turning into death traps as we see the sophistication of the IEDs. We don't have enough of the mine protection vehicles, and we haven't even ordered enough, and we haven't put them into the theater.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

If we're gonna put these soldiers and Marines into these very exposed positions, which this strategy calls for, please, come to us, ask for whatever you need to try to provide maximum protection. I disapprove of the policy. I think it is a dead-end. It continues the blank check. But if we're going to do it, then let's make sure we have every possible piece of equipment and resource necessary to protect these young men and women that we're asking to go out and put this policy forward when we're not doing the political side of the equation that is necessary to maximize the chance for their safety and success.

"The Early Show," CBS, 1/23/2007

SMITH: And as it happens we have the only woman who seems to be running for president right now with us in Washington.

Senator Clinton, good morning.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democratic Presidential Candidate): Hi, Harry.

SMITH: Let me start with this notion of electability...

Sen. CLINTON: Right.

SMITH: ...because Democrats seem to--your poll numbers with Democrats are really pretty good. They're not so good in the rest of the country among Independents and especially Republicans. And the Democrats are faced with a choice early next year with the caucuses and primaries. They have to find somebody who's electable to president. How do you change the minds of so many people who really don't like you?

Sen. CLINTON: (Laughing) What a way to start my morning!

SMITH: It's just the truth. You know that. You know what I'm talking about.

Sen. CLINTON: No, but, you know, I was told the same thing when I started running in New York.

SMITH: Right.

Sen. CLINTON: I was told that people didn't like me, they wouldn't vote for me and what I wanted there, and what I want here is just a chance.

SMITH: Hm.

Sen. CLINTON: For people to get to know me as I am, not as they may have heard about me from, you know, cable TV or radio or somewhere.

SMITH: Right. Yeah.

Sen. CLINTON: Because what I found in New York is that once I got out and showed people what my values are, what I stand for, what my work ethic is, the results I can get, I've brought along a lot of people, not only Democrats, but Independents and even some convinced Republicans.

SMITH: Can you break through, though? Because I've heard you talk on a couple of newscasts last night. You may be the most famous person you say that people don't really know.

Sen. CLINTON: Right.

SMITH: There's so--even watching you move about New York yesterday, there's this phalanx of press, there's press from around the world. Can you break through? Can you be able to sit in the living rooms of people in Iowa or in town meetings in New Hampshire and get your message across, past the press, past the preconceptions?

Sen. CLINTON: There's two ways I'm going to do it. One is the old-fashioned way of getting out there and going into living rooms and church basements and union halls and everywhere that I can, which again, I did in New York. After the press got, you know, a little bit bored and decided that they were going to go cover somebody else, I really did have that chance. And secondly, I am using the Web. You know, I started these webchats last night on hillaryclinton.com, and I'll have another one tonight at 7, and another one tomorrow at 7.

SMITH: Mm-hmm.

Sen. CLINTON: So the people can ask me the questions that are on their minds, and we got thousands of questions. And we tried to make sure that, you know, I'm communicating directly...

SMITH: Yeah.

Sen. CLINTON: ...in frankly, an unfiltered way, so that people can figure out whether they agree with me or don't agree with me. But I'm actually very encouraged by these numbers. You know, anybody who gets the nomination is going to end up with a high negative, because I've been around long enough to know how effective the other side is in, you know, characterizing, mischaracterizing people.

SMITH: Right.

Sen. CLINTON: We've seen that in the last two presidential elections. But what I think I bring to the table, in addition to my ideas and my experience, is that I'm battle-hardened. I've been there. I know how to overcome these kinds of political tactics.

SMITH: Which brings to mind Whitewater, Travelgate, the impeachment process. You were under the glare of the spotlight for eight years, and many of those days were--have to have been horrible. Why go back? Why go back into the middle of the white hot glare of that light?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, Harry, I think the country's turned a page on all of that, and I certainly have. I live, you know, in the present, looking toward the future.

SMITH: But you know people will bring--it will come back again and again.

Sen. CLINTON: Well that--they can do that if they want. But you know, I am very confident that people are more interested in looking toward the future. And you know, from my perspective, what I'm hearing when I go around talking to people is, you know, what is my plan of health care, for energy, for global climate change, for good jobs for people.

SMITH: Hm.

Sen. CLINTON: And I think on what really matters to voters...

SMITH: Right.

Sen. CLINTON: ...I'm going to be able to put forth my vision and persuade people to support me.

SMITH: The president is going to talk a lot about his domestic initiatives tonight. Is there anything you've heard in the last 24 hours that you think Democrats can work with the president on?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, from what I hear, at least he's going to be opening the door on health care and energy, which I'm thrilled about. I don't know that I will agree with his particulars, but the fact that the president's going to stand up and put forth a plan to try to help get everybody insured is a big step forward for this White House, and I want to be part of that solution. And the same on energy. Again, I don't think it will be bold enough, I don't think it will go far enough, but that's what the political process is supposed to do. He's opening the door, we've got our ideas in the Democratic Congress. Let's work together.

SMITH: And if the first primary in the country were held today, and it was between you and Barack Obama, why would people vote for you, or why should they?

Sen. CLINTON: Well that's what the campaign's going to be about and I'm going to be out there putting forth my ideas, my experience, my qualifications. And ultimately, it is up to the voters.

SMITH: All right. Senator Clinton, thank you so much. Do appreciate it.

Sen. CLINTON: Thanks, Harry.

SMITH: Let's go back to New York now. Russ has more news.

Good morning, Russ.

RUSS MITCHELL, anchor:

Good morning, Harry.

"Today," NBC, 1/23/2007

MS. VIEIRA: New York Senator and now presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton will be in the audience tonight as the president delivers that State of the Union address.

Senator Clinton, good morning to you.

SEN. CLINTON: Good morning, Meredith.

MS. VIEIRA: You just heard Tony Snow say that he does not believe that the public has stopped listening to the president. Do you agree with that?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, Meredith, based on everything that I hear, and people talk to me, there's a great discouragement about the president's leadership. And there is an openness in looking to see what the Democratic majority in Congress can do.

Obviously we have to work with the president because he has veto power. He has a lot of other residual powers that reside in the office. And that's what we should do. But we have to do it in a way that moves the progress forward for average Americans. And I'm looking forward to hearing what the president has to say.

You know, the leaks that have come out of the White House suggest to me that on health care and energy, two of the signature issues we have to address, it's not going to be as practical and hopeful as it's being advertised. And so we're going to have our work to do in Congress. But I'm looking forward to that work.

MS. VIEIRA: Senator, you would like to be the next president. As you said, you're in it, and you're in it to win. Let's talk about the good news and the bad news when it comes to our candidacy. The good news for you is that polling indicates that right now you are the favorite for the Democratic nomination.

The bad news is that many voters still have this very negative opinion of you, and some of the words that are used to describe you are not very kind. They're words like "strident," "cold," "scripted," "phony."

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.)

MS. VIEIRA: You're laughing at that. Advisers have said that they want to humanize you. Why do people seem to have that perception of you after knowing you for 15 years?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, Meredith, that's exactly what I ran into when I started campaigning in New York, the same kinds of attitudes and stereotypes. And what I've tried to do in New York and been very pleased that I could get such a great response from the people of my state was to say, "Look, here's who I really am. I may be the most famous person you really don't know. And at the end of getting to know me, draw your own conclusion. Don't draw it from what you hear somebody say on, you know, radio or cable TV. Draw your own conclusion."

And that's why I'm engaged in this conversation. You know, I started last night on HillaryClinton.com a Web chat, and I'm going to continue to tonight and tomorrow at 7:00, because I want people, you know, to see me in an unfiltered way. That doesn't mean that, you know, 100 percent of the people who do are going to all of a sudden agree with me or, you know, want to vote for me. But I think I can slowly but surely open people's minds to listen to me and see me for who I am. And that's all I can ask for.

MS. VIEIRA: You know, in the end, candidates have to defend your record. And you are off to Iowa, where the former senator, John Edwards, is polling very well. And he has sort of positioned himself as the anti-war candidate. I'm envisioning the debate between the two of you when he turns to you and says, "I have repudiated my vote to go to war in Iraq. I've said it's a mistake, Senator. Why can't you say your vote was a mistake?" What will your response be?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, Meredith, I've taken responsibility for my vote. But I also, as a member of the United States Senate, have an obligation to try to figure out what we're going to try to do now. I'm not on the sidelines. I'm in the arena. I'm on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

You know, I look at those terrible death figures and injuries that our young men and women are suffering, and I'm trying to figure out what is the smart, right way to get us out of Iraq. How do we have a phased redeployment of our troops? How do we get this Iraqi government to do what we've been, you know, expecting and asking them to do? How do we get the neighborhood and the countries involved so they can help us?

So, you know, I have taken responsibility. I've asked that the president take responsibility. And I think when I talk with people, what everyone I talk with is focused on is not looking backwards, but what do we do now, and how do we save American lives, save Iraqi lives, have whatever success can come out of this terrible situation? And that's what I'm focused on trying to achieve.

MS. VIEIRA: But people also look for a consistent record. When you say you've taken responsibility, Senator, once again, is that the same thing as saying, "I made a mistake by voting for the war"?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, I -- you know, it's interesting to me how clear I've been that what I said repeatedly was that we were not conducting this in a very effective way. I've been one of the most consistent and persistent critics.

I've also made it very clear that if we had known then what we know now, there would never have been a vote and I never would have voted for it. But from my perspective, you know, you don't get do-overs in life. I have tried to be a constructive contributor to getting us in a better position than we are now so that we could begin to withdraw our troops the right way, protect them, do whatever we can to help stabilize Iraq. And I do believe we still have national interests in Iraq, particularly when it comes to al Qaeda in Iraq.

You know, as a senator from New York, maybe I have a different attitude than some people, but I was at Ground Zero again yesterday, and there are lots of bad folks out there who want to kill us. And our job is to try to prevent that from happening, despite the mistakes made by everybody in the pursuit of this policy since 2002.

MS. VIEIRA: Senator Clinton, your husband said last night that he will do whatever he's asked to do when it comes to your campaign. What do you want him to do?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, he's been my greatest supporter and most effective counselor, and he will continue to do that. But obviously he's a tremendous asset because he knows what the job is like. He had great success on a number of difficult fronts when he was president. He's also now extremely involved in activities around the world through his foundation. And through that he understands what America has to do to regain our leadership and the respect of the world so that we can make better decisions. So I'm going to be looking to him for a lot of advice and guidance.

MS. VIEIRA: All right, Senator Hillary Clinton, thank you very much for your time this morning.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you.

"Good Morning America," ABC, 1/23/2007

MS. SAWYER: Senator Clinton, good morning, and an official welcome to the campaign trail.

SEN. CLINTON: Oh, thank you, Diane.

MS. SAWYER: Let us begin with the issue that overwhelmingly Americans say is the central issue on their minds. And, of course, that is Iraq. Tonight the president's going to speak. He has said -- this is his rallying cry, and it's simple -- "We will prevail." In a simple sentence, what is your rallying cry? We will what?

SEN. CLINTON: We will protect American interests and American servicemembers, and do our best to give Iraq a stable and secure future. And earlier, the president had made these same claims time and time again.

MS. SAWYER: A question about something you put online yesterday in one of your conversations online. It was pretty emphatic: "I certainly wouldn't have voted to authorize the war, knowing what I know now." The president has admitted some mistakes in Iraq. Is that your biggest mistake as senator?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think giving the president the authority has turned out to be a terrible decision for everyone, including the president.

MS. SAWYER: A couple of quick questions about the campaign. It was almost 15 years ago now that another candidate had something to say while running for office, and he was saying it about you. We're going to play it.

PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON: (From videotape.) Our life is very much a partnership. Our public endeavors we do in common. And I always say that my slogan might well be "buy one, get one free."

MS. SAWYER: Is that your slogan this time around -- buy one, get one free?

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.) Well, I'm certainly going to count on his advice and his experience, not only here at home with the great progress that were made on some many important issues when he was president, but also what he knows about the world in which we find ourselves today. And I'm very grateful to have his stanch support and his good advice going forward.

MS. SAWYER: So buy one, get one free, still serves?

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.) Well, I wouldn't say it quite like that. You know, I'm running to be the president, to make the decisions. But I'm going to be reaching out to as many people who can help us get our country back on the right track.

MS. SAWYER: Yesterday, talking about Barack Obama, when asked specifically if he is qualified to be commander in chief, to be president, you didn't answer. You said, "I'm going to let the American people decide." You know the office. You know him. Why not say?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, Diane, we have a terrific, talented group of people running for the nomination on our side, and he certainly is one of them, and has a lot to contribute to this campaign. But at the end of the day, because I've been around so much and I have watched as voters weigh how serious a decision it is to decide who will be president and commander in chief, I think it is for the voters to determine.

And that's what the campaign will be about. The campaign will test us all. The campaign will, you know, come at us in unexpected ways. And how people respond and what they have to say and what their values are all will come out in the campaign. So I think it is properly --

MS. SAWYER: So does it imply --

SEN. CLINTON: -- left to the voters.

MS. SAWYER: Does it imply you doubt it?

SEN. CLINTON: I have no opinion one way or the other. We're all in this to demonstrate as clearly as we can that we're ready for the most important and difficult job in the world. I think I may have a bit of an inside track in understanding just how difficult it is, and especially what our next president will inherit, which unfortunately is going to be just a terrible amount of difficulty here at home and abroad. So I'm going to go forward with, you know, my qualifications, my ideas, and I expect to be judged as I expect all the rest of our candidates to be judged.

MS. SAWYER: One final question, about Chelsea. What's the most interesting thing she said to you about your decision to do this?

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.) Well, you know, I would never share that. You know, I'm very grateful for her support and her good counsel.

MS. SAWYER: And will she be out on the campaign trail with you?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, she's pretty busy. She's got a life and a job of her own. And you know, I'm going to be out there on my own talking about what I want to do because that's who I'm asking people to vote for. And I hope I'm successful in making that case.

MS. SAWYER: Senator Clinton, thanks so much. Come back soon.

SEN. CLINTON: Thanks a lot, Diane.

"Countdown with Keith Olbermann," MSNBC, 1/23/2007

(Begin videotaped segment.)

MR. OLBERMANN: Thank you for some of your time, first of all.

SEN. CLINTON: I'm happy to be here with you.

MR. OLBERMANN: Let me start in the immediate future. What, if anything, could the president of the United States say during the State of the Union tonight that would cause you to stand up and applaud and cheer?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, it would be great if he said, "You know, I've changed my mind about the escalation of troops going into Iraq." I'd love to hear him put forth a real energy policy, not just nibbling around the edges, that would deal with our security and our economic problems with the way we get energy today, as well as global climate change.

I know he's going to talk about health care. I'm anxious to hear that, because anything that moves us toward universal coverage is something that I'm going to look at seriously.

But I also hope that he will genuinely reach out to the new Democratic majority and say, "Look, you know, we've got two years left in my term and I want to make a difference, and let's work together."

MR. OLBERMANN: Do you think he's grasped the actual nature of bipartisanship to this point? Is there evidence to you that that is the case?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, Keith, I think his idea of bipartisanship and mine are pretty different. I mean, his idea is "I'm going to tell you what to do; come join me." That's not the way the political process does work or should work.

If he genuinely is open and not just going through the motions, I think he'll find a lot of us who are receptive in the Senate, because we have such a narrow majority, we have to find common ground. And I'd like to see if we could do that.

MR. OLBERMANN: You mentioned the health care issue likely to come up in the speech. The early indications about that are that it would -- whatever would be provided for people would be taken out of hospital budgets, out of public hospital budgets. That can't sit well with you.

SEN. CLINTON: It certainly doesn't. And if that's truly what the plan is going to be -- because, you know, that's kind of the budgetary implications; I don't think he'll say tonight, "I'm going to try to rob Peter to pay Paul," but if he is going after hospital budgets, you know, that's going to be a serious problem for those of us who care about having a safety system that is going to be there for everybody who needs a hospital.

There are other ways of doing this, and I think we can work together to try to find them.

MR. OLBERMANN: If you were president today, as opposed to January 2009, what would you do, as we finish this interview, about Iraq?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I would certainly call off any escalation of troops. I would immediately begin the kind of diplomatic and political engagement that a lot of us have recommended over a number of years, and most recently the Iraq Study Group.

I would make it clear to the Maliki government and all of the parties in Iraq that they had to come to some resolution of the issues that are still outstanding. And I would send the toughest, meanest presidential envoy to sit there and make it happen.

You know, we have some record of success with that. We were able to, on a smaller scale but still a lethal conflict, work out some accommodation among the parties in the Balkans. And it took a lot of American leadership and it took us sending troops. We've never had the proportionate number of troops committed under this president to Iraq that we did when we went into Bosnia. So we've not done this in the right way from the very beginning.

But we do still have some dangerous problems that could come from Iraq, like al Qaeda in Iraq is determined to kill Americans. They've had the unfortunate success this weekend of killing the third-highest number of Americans ever to die on a single day.

So I want to get our troops out of harm's way. I want to move them to positions where they can deal with al Qaeda, who's our principal enemy, where we can make sure that the Iranians aren't crossing the border when we're trying to have some kind of political diplomatic engagement.

But you've got to put a lot more effort into this. There is no military solution. There are political resolutions that could be reached through the hard, slow, frustrating work of diplomacy.

MR. OLBERMANN: And that presumably would involve other nations. You mentioned the Balkans. You mentioned the Iraq Study Group. Would you reach out immediately to the Syrians and the Iranians, even with the tensions between this country and Iran?

SEN. CLINTON: Absolutely. I don't see it as a sign of weakness. I see it as a sign of strength. You know, our president will not talk to people he considers bad. Well, there are a lot of bad actors in the world, and you don't make peace with your friends. You've got to deal with your enemies, your opponents, people whose interests diverge from yours.

Right now we're flying blind when it comes to Iran. We don't have good intelligence about Iran, about what their real motivations are, who's calling the shots; the same with Syria. And I would immediately open a diplomatic track. And I don't think we would lose. In fact, I think we would gain insight.

I mean, if we have to take a firm stand against Iran to prevent it from obtaining nuclear weapons, let's get more information before we do that. Let's figure out, you know, what levers of power in their society we might be able to pull and push.

MR. OLBERMANN: Richard Clarke said on this newscast last night that the administration, current administration, has operated without any intelligence for the last few years. I thought it was quite a double entendre, on this subject especially.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I'm afraid that Richard Clarke is right, and he would certainly know that. You know, we've done this on a variety of fronts. Look at what's happening in Latin America, where we are seeing anti-American regimes gain ground. You know, we don't engage with bad guys so we don't engage with, you know, Chavez and try to, you know, see if there's any way to pull him back or at least prevent others from following his lead.

We have all kinds of issues with Pakistan and Afghanistan. I came back from my most recent trip and urged the White House to appoint a high-level presidential envoy. Both of the leaders, President Karzai, President Musharraf, said that their relations are deteriorating. That's bad for us.

You know, but if we had somebody there who could help to resolve these differences and get over some of the problems that they have, you know, that would enhance Afghan security. It would, you know, give Musharraf a stronger hand to deal with his internal problems. And it would give us a better way to make sure that the Taliban offensive that's going to happen in the spring isn't successful.

(Announcements.)

MR. OLBERMANN: Senator, back to Iraq, and this pertains to the presidential candidacy. How would you answer people who approach this and say, "I could not possibly vote for anyone who, no matter how misled they might have been, no matter how misled the country might have been, voted in any way to authorize what has happened in Iraq"? How would you answer that?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I understand that. And, in fact, I had a lot of conversations just along those lines in my last election in New York. Nobody is more heartsick about the policy in Iraq than I am. I am just, you know, devastated at the incompetence and arrogance of the administration in pursuing this policy based on the authority that I and others granted the president.

I regret the way he's used that authority. And I think you don't get do-overs in life, and I've tried to take responsibility for, you know, my actions in the Senate. And I've been a very persistent and consistent critic of the actions that the administration has taken.

But we are where we are right now. American soldiers and Marines are dying. The Iraqi government is on the brink of falling apart. We've got Iran and Syria gaining on us. We've got the Kurds trying to figure out which way they're going to go, and we need to be very conscious of, you know, the impact that could have on our strong NATO ally, Turkey. We've got al Qaeda in Iraq looking for a base to launch all kinds of terrible actions against us.

So, you know, I just think that when you're in the arena -- and as I have said before, I'm kind of cursed with the responsibility gene. I'm trying to figure out what is best for us to do. And I know clearly that this escalation is wrong, and I wish that we could come up with the president listening and taking a different course. But right now I see no evidence that he will do that.

MR. OLBERMANN: You mentioned the word responsibility. You mentioned the word regret. So much of politics, so much of political coverage now, is about individual words and people who will not use individual words or will. The president was hard-pressed to find, in a period of four years, anything that he viewed as a mistake in his presidency.

Would you apply the word mistake to your vote to authorize the war in Iraq?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think many of us know very well that if we knew then what we know now, there never would have been a vote. And I certainly wouldn't have voted to give the president authority.

At the time, though -- and this is something that people are, you know, so upset about that they don't even want to think about -- you know, putting inspectors in and containing Saddam Hussein was not a bad strategy. It just turned into a disaster because of the way Bush misused the authority that he was given.

So clearly I think that there have been a lot of mistakes made by everybody, including those of us in the Congress.

MR. OLBERMANN: All right, the New Hampshire primary; a year from right now we will just be getting the results --

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.)

MR. OLBERMANN: -- of the New Hampshire primary. So how can you and Senator Obama and Senator Edwards and Governor Vilsack and Governor Richardson, and everybody else who's considering or has considered or will run for the Democratic nomination, maintain and survive --

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.)

MR. OLBERMANN: -- a campaign of that length, to say nothing of the American people? How do we do this?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I wish there were a limit on our campaign time. I like what some of the European countries do, where, you know, there's a starting and an end date, and everybody works like crazy in the middle.

You know, I think it's kind of strange that we started so soon. You know, my husband got into the presidential campaign of '92 in October of '91. So, you know, my experience is a little different. But I don't know whether it's the 24/7 news cycle, Keith. I don't know whether it's the pent-up desire on the part of Democrats to be done with President Bush -- (laughs) -- even though he's going to be president for two more years. I don't know all the factors at work. But clearly this is off to a very fast start.

And pacing yourself, being able to do what you have to do to get into those living rooms and those church basements and those union halls and those diners and, you know, communicate across the Web like, you know, I'm trying to do with my Web chats on, you know, HillaryClinton.com, all of that, you know, I just feel like you've got to play the hand you're dealt. And in this election cycle, clearly we're off to a fast start. I believe that I would be the best candidate, so I've got to get out there and make the case to the voters.

MR. OLBERMANN: All right, let me close where we began, with the State of the Union address. What, in your opinion, is, as of right now, the state of the Union?

SEN. CLINTON: Troubled, anxious, insecure, disheartened. You know, there are some people who are doing extremely well, but the middle-class squeeze is real. There's a lot of anxiety among the people that I represent and talk to about how they're going to afford everything from health care to education for their kids, whether their job is going to be there, whether they're going to have that pension that they think they've worked for their entire life.

You know, on these Web chats that I've been having, you know -- another one tonight at 7:00, another one tomorrow at 7:00 on HillaryClinton.com -- I keep hearing that. People say, "I'm a 55-year-old woman. I've worked all my life. I've got no retirement security." Or "I don't see how I'm going to be able to health care." Or "How am I going to be able to send my children to college?"

You know, the American dream needs to be renewed. And we can do that if we turn our attention to the building blocks that made the American middle class possible. I mean, I'm a product of that. I came out of a family that, you know, worked its way up and gave me all of these opportunities.

But I feel as though we're stagnant now. If you look at productivity, it's up. If you look at corporate profits, you know, they're up. If you look at income, it's pretty stagnant. And we've got to get back to the American promise that I was raised with and give it back to people so that they can make a better life for themselves and their children.

"MSNBC Special," MSNBC, 1/23/2007

MR. MATTHEWS: We're joined right now by the junior senator from New York, Senator Hillary Clinton, and she's, of course, the Democratic candidate -- or a Democratic candidate for president.

Senator Clinton, let me ask you about the president tonight. Do you think he's sincere when he calls for bipartisan action on a number of these issues?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think the jury is out, Chris. I'm not quite sure. We have six years of experience that suggest that that's not their favored means of getting anything done. But I'm open to it, and I think all of the Democrats are. He mentioned a few issues, like energy independence and health care, where we are eager to work towards some kind of bipartisan result.

So let's see what happens. I mean, the proof is in the pudding. We'll see whether his speech tonight is followed up by any specific actions and the kind of outreach that should be undertaken.

MR. MATTHEWS: Back when you were working so hard on health care back in the '90s, in the early '90s --

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.)

MR. MATTHEWS: -- and you really thought you could get some kind of compromise at the end, I believe, and a word came from the ideologues on the right, "Kill this baby in its bassinet. Do not let them get a compromised health care bill that they can get credit for" -- do you still feel the sting of that strategy on the other side?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, I really don't. I regret that we've lost all this time in trying to deal with a problem that affects our economy, that undermines our productivity and makes us less competitive than we would be otherwise. So I think we really missed the opportunity to take care of the problem that health care financing poses.

But you know, I'm a realist, and I get up every day and try to figure out what we're going to get done today to move the ball forward. So I'm ready to, you know, work with anybody. I'm not interested in scoring partisan or ideological points on some imaginary board in the sky. Let's try to get something done.

I have too many people I represent right now, Chris, who are struggling because they don't have health care.

We've got more than 46 million Americans, 9 million children. You know, let's put down the ideological battle ground and once again try to find some common ground.

MR. OLBERMAN: Senator, when we spoke this morning, I asked you what might be said in this speech that would get you to stand up and cheer and applaud for the president. You mentioned health care. He discussed health care. You suggested he should reach out to the Democrats and actually go for genuine bipartisanship. There were words to that effect. As you point out, how sincere they are will only be told by a time. A real energy policy. There were hints at an energy policy.

But the last point that you made -- or the first point you actually made was a changing of the mind on troop escalation would have been the thing that would have easily brought you to your feet. We did not get that. Iraq did not come in till well over 3,000 words had been spoken in this speech in a backwards kind of way, in an unexpected kind of way.

Did the president not spend enough time talking about Iraq tonight?

SEN. CLINTON: Well actually, Keith, I think he made his whole defense of Iraq because he started by linking it to the war on terror, which all of us support. And I have been, you know, adamant that we have to be more effective and smarter in going after the bad guys who are after us. And he certainly tried to once again summon the Congress and the country to see his version of reality. I don't think it's going to sell. I think that a majority of Democrats and a sizable number of Republicans are turning against this policy of escalation not because we don't want to fight the war on terror -- in fact, we want to fight it smarter and better -- but because it is only a slice of a strategy.

Where is the internationalization of this problem, the regional conference, the reaching out to the neighbors? Where is the continual pressure on the Iraqi government to deal with the political and economic problems they face?

You know, when I returned from Iraq and Afghanistan a week ago, I said: Look, I'm against this troop escalation. Let's see if we can't put some pressure on the Iraqi government to start doing the things all of us know need to be done in order for there to be some kind of political resolution, since we know there is no military solution.

MR. MATTHEWS: What do you think, Senator, of the fact that the president's decided to go down to Williamsburg in a week or so and actually join the House -- you're laughing. Okay, this is a personal question. Would you accept an invitation if the Republicans invited you to their retreat?

SEN. CLINTON: Absolutely, in a New York minute, Chris. I think it's a great invitation. I'm glad the president accepted.

You know, some of these things may be ritualistic. You know that. You've been in this town a lot longer than I have.

But I think it also does at least show respect for the process.

We need to get back to working with each other and, you know, pursuing some common means toward getting results for our constituents and our country. So I'm glad that the president was invited, and I'm delighted that he's going.

MR. MATTHEWS: You think you can retell those Republicans into voting for you?

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.) Well, I got some of them in New York. I'd like to figure out if I could get a few more.

MR. MATTHEWS: I knew you'd break. By the way, wasn't that great about Wesley Autrey tonight? Wasn't he great?

SEN. CLINTON: I loved it. We were really thrilled that he was there. And what a terrific guy he is. I'm very proud of him as a New Yorker.

MR. MATTHEWS: God, America's proud of the guy. Humanity's proud of the guy.

MR. OLBERMANN: Mm-hmm.

SEN. CLINTON: That's exactly right.

MR. MATTHEWS: It's so great to have you on, Senator. Thank you very much, Senator Hillary Clinton of New York.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you.

"Countdown," MSNBC, 1/24/2007

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I believe that I would be the best candidate. So I've got to get out there and make the case to the voters.

OLBERMANN: Right. To that point, with the fullest possible respect, what qualifies you to be president of the United States? What, if you could pick and could only show to the voters one element of your resume, would you say, "This is it, this why"?

CLINTON: Well, I think my service in the Senate and as first lady in the White House, the combination. Obviously, I have a lifetime of experience that I'll be sharing with the voters on a range of issues and causes that I've been involved in.

But having seen what happens a White House when you face difficult decisions, understanding how to structure it, how to work with the Congress, how to take your message not only to our country, but to world and then now having been in the Senate, and having been reelected based on my record in the Senate, I feel confident that I would be able to work with the Congress.

And I think that, you know, presidents who come in oftentimes, you know, try to make it us versus them. That doesn't work. You've got to enlist the Congress in your own party, as well as the other party, and really find common ground in order to make progress in America.

Our political system is set up in a way to be cumbersome and difficult. And, you know, most of the time that's OK, because we don't have a president who basically runs over everybody, as we've had this last six years. We have someone who will respect the balance of power and the constitutional separation of powers. And I think I could understand how to make progress on these big issues we face.

OLBERMANN: But having spent eight years in the White House under the conditions in which you and your husband spent them, that's a reason to want to go back to the White House?

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: It is for me. It is for me because, you know, I was very, very proud of the record that the president left at the end of two terms. And then I saw this president come in and basically undo everything that had been done, whether it was good for the country or not. I think we should build on the progress of the past.

Obviously, we have new challenges. It's the 21st century. But to squander the budget deficit, to squander the good will of the world after 9/11, to launch a preemptive war, which I said at the time I was against, all that has just caused us so many difficult challenges.

And on top of that, to fail to meet the other problems we confront, the health care and education and energy and environmental, all of those issues. We've lost time. We've lost six years because we haven't had the leadership that we need from the White House.

So, maybe because I have seen it in a very up close and personal way, and now on the other end of Pennsylvania, I've served in the Senate and I understand how difficult it is to work that body and get people on your side.

I feel like I'm really prepared to do what is going to be needed, starting in January, 2009, to get back on the right track in our country.

OLBERMANN: What role will the former president play in your campaign between now and January, 2009?

CLINTON: Well, he will remain my staunchest supporter and greatest adviser. And you know, as the campaign progresses I'm sure we will be involved in it. But I'm running on my own. And I bear the extra challenge of being the first, you know, woman in a long time to try. And I intend to go all the way, so that will make history as well. And he will be there helping and supporting me.

OLBERMANN: Would he be in the administration?

CLINTON: You know, I think it is smart to use former presidents.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: I think that, you know, when this president asked Bill and his father to work on important issues like the tsunami and Katrina, it sent a great message to the world. And, you know, just to add, look at the difference that what we did tsunami as headed by Bill and former President Bush made, you know, the popularity of America went up in the countries where they went and, you know, shared the commitment that America had to helping people recover.

You know, we can do a lot more. And someone, you know, like my husband would be a tremendous ambassador for our country. And so I expect I will be reaching out to former presidents.

OLBERMANN: The Internet roll-out of your campaign seems to have been a very intriguing one. Many people have used the Internet before. Senator Obama made his announcement in that way. But with the Internet chats, with this direct kind of approach, are you even taking this another level past what might be the Internet establishment -- if there is such a thing that - - the blogosphere?

Are you sort of setting up on your own, using the technology, and really trying to get unfiltered, even by the people who think they are unfiltered on the net?

CLINTON: I`m going to use every aspect of the Internet. But clearly I want to be able to communicate directly to people. I found, when I started running in New York, that many people had opinions about me that were quite, you know, unusual and I had to overcome those.

And when you would ask somebody, well, where did you hear that? It was, well, you know, one of your competitors, for example. And I just feel that if I can communicate directly -- I`m not expecting, you know, a hundred percent of the people to agree with me or like me, any of that -- but at least I will have a fighting chance to be heard and to be assessed on my own merits. And that is what I`m looking for.

But I`m also going to participate in everything else that the Internet -- that the cyber world we live in today has to offer.

OLBERMANN: Senator, our greatest thanks for your time.

CLINTON: Thank you. Good to be with you.

“Anderson Cooper 360,” CNN, 1/29/2007

ANDERSON COOPER, CNN ANCHOR: Good evening, everyone.

Senator John McCain said it best today. Americans disagree about the war, but not about the troops. And you can see that sentiment all around me tonight, in bricks and mortar, help and hope.

We're inside the newly dedicated Center for the Intrepid at the Brooke Army Medical Center here in San Antonio, Texas. This is a state-of-the-art rehab facility for troops recovering from amputations and burns and other serious injuries. This is a privately funded addition, along with two new homes for visiting relatives nearby, Fisher Houses, they are called.

More than 600,000 Americans made this center possible. Their donations, some $50 million in all, were recognized today by a parade of leaders and lawmakers and celebrities.

But, frankly, the true celebrities were the service members themselves. The facility includes exercise equipment, a running track, a climbing wall, and some truly 21st century tools to help the wounded get to the point where running laps and climbing walls is a possibility again.

We're going to have a lot from this center tonight. Sadly, in Iraq, the fighting and the dying goes on, at least two more soldiers killed over the weekend. Their chopper went down during a pitched battle near Najaf -- U.S. and Iraqi forces on one side, a cult-like band of mostly Shia militants on the other, apparently trying to slaughter clerics, in order to bring the return of their savior.

Reports are, as many as 200 insurgents were killed in the fighting. And that battle raised warning flags here at home. Why, for example, did Iraqi forces need so much American help? What does it say about President Bush's faith in his new plan or in Iraq's prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki?

Senators Hillary Clinton and John McCain came for the dedication here in San Antonio today.

This afternoon, they sat down with me.

I began by asking each about what happened in Najaf.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: This weekend, there was big -- a big attack in -- in Najaf. How do you read that? What -- what does that tell you about the situation in Iraq?

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN (R), ARIZONA: I'm not sure exactly how to read it.

It shows, I think, that they are capable of assembling hundreds of insurgents. I think it is also good that we attack them before they orchestrate an attack, in other words, as a preemptive strike, which means that our intelligence may be getting better. But I -- all of us know that, are familiar with it, that this is very long and very difficult.

COOPER: What is your take on what happened this weekend in -- in Najaf, some 200 insurgents killed, seemed to be hundreds of insurgents involved in a mass operation?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Anderson, I think there are hundreds and thousands of insurgents who are willing to fight us and engage in sectarian warfare in Iraq.

One of the reasons I oppose the escalation is that I don't believe that, you know, putting more American troops into Baghdad is going to really stem this insurgency. The Iraqis have to do it themselves. And, unfortunately, they have been given an open-ended commitment.

That's why I have called for capping troops and putting more pressure on the Iraqi government to begin to take the actions we expect them to take on their own behalf.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: And that is the question, of course. Can Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki deliver? Can he be trusted?

Again, Senators McCain and Clinton:

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: Do you trust al-Maliki? Vice President Cheney said that he -- he did.

MCCAIN: I don't think he's been strong.

I have been disappointed in some of his decisions, such as the release of people we had captured, the lifting of the checkpoints around Sadr City at one point. I think he is showing some signs of improvement. And I -- we will know. Again, the -- now, I'm not sure how quickly we are going to know whether we are winning militarily, but I think we will know fairly soon, in the next several months, whether the government, the Iraqi government, is doing what's necessary.

Passing a law on the oil revenues, provincial elections, there are several things that are -- that are going to have to happen.

COOPER: Vice President Cheney said last week to Wolf Blitzer he -- he trusts al-Maliki.

Do you?

CLINTON: No.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: But I also don't trust Vice President Cheney. So, I really think it's fair to say his assessments have been wrong consistently.

He has been unwilling to deal in a straightforward, factual-based way with a lot of what's been going on. He continues to make assertions that have no foundation in fact, in reality. I don't think the American people are listening to him any longer.

COOPER: Senator Durbin called him delusional.

CLINTON: Well, I'm not going to...

COOPER: Do you think he's delusional?

CLINTON: I'm not going to, you know, put labels on it.

But I am going to say that his efforts to continue to put the best face on what they have so terribly mismanaged in Iraq no longer has any credibility attached to it.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: You are going to hear from both senators more -- a lot, in fact -- in this next hour ahead.

But, first, a hero's story. Like so many soldiers and Marines wounded in Iraq, he survived injuries that might have been fatal in past wars. Combat medicine has improved to the point that more than 90 percent of the wounded now survive.

They survive, though, to fight the toughest battle of their lives. Well, you ought to stay right here. Some of what you will see tonight may be tough to watch.

Senator McCain had an answer for that today. He said -- and I quote -- "We can only offer you our humility," he said of the wounded. He went on to say, "If it is hard to look at for some people, this is what we have done to scores of young men. So, pay attention."

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER (voice-over): For Master Sergeant Daniel Robles, life has become a series of before-and-afters, before and after the attack, before and after he was again able to walk on his own.

MASTER SERGEANT DANIEL ROBLES, U.S. ARMY: I was able to stand up. And it just, like -- you know, just you showed me that this is the -- right now, the sky is the limit. You know, you just got to work at it.

COOPER: It's been nearly 10 months since Sergeant Robles' Humvee was hit by an IED, a roadside bomb, in Baghdad. Shrapnel ripped through the vehicle, shredding and badly burning both his legs.

ROBLES: I kind of looked down at my leg and seen that the -- that it was inside out, pretty much. And I kind of realized what had happened. I just remember thinking that I didn't want to die, and all I only wanted to do was see my family again.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Whoa.

(LAUGHTER)

COOPER: Doctors were forced to amputate both his legs below the knee. His future, at first, seemed only dark. And, yet, Master Sergeant Robles says his family kept him going. He also says the staff here at the Brooke Army Medical Center would not let him quit.

ROBLES: I remember being in the hospital some days, you know, and just hitting rock bottom, you know, thinking that all I was going to be able to do was lay in bed and look at the clock on the wall.

And, you know, the people here, the therapists and everybody, they didn't let me sit there and do that.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL JENNIFER MENETREZ, U.S. ARMY PHYSICIAN: We don't dwell, necessarily, on what is gone, what's not there anymore. It's what we can do, what they can still do. And we have to maximize that by whatever means.

COOPER (on camera): The doctors here at the Brooke Army Medical Center have cared for more than 2,400 service members from Iraq and Afghanistan. Most have either severe burns or multiple amputations.

Many of these service members would not have survived their injuries even 10 years ago. But, thanks to advances with battlefield medicine, they are able to make it home alive, but with life-altering injuries.

(voice-over): As a survivor, Sergeant Nathan Reed considers himself lucky. He was searching a car at a Baghdad checkpoint, when a bomb exploded, ripping through his right leg. It was amputated above the knee.

SERGEANT NATHAN REED, U.S. ARMY: Oh, it really hurt me, in a sense, because I felt like my family and my soldiers needed me to be at 100 percent. So, hearing the fact that I had to have my leg amputated kind of took a lot out of me.

COOPER: But, with physical therapists here and a new prosthetic leg, Sergeant Reed now walks, bikes, even runs. His family stayed at one of the Fisher Houses on base during his recovery. And, like many wounded soldiers, he has decided to stay in the Army.

REED: For me, it just made me stronger and made me want to complete my goal even more.

COOPER: As for Sergeant Robles, he also wants to stay on active duty, possibly becoming an instructor at the new rehabilitation security on base, the Center for the Intrepid.

On Sunday, he was honored with a Bronze Star and a Purple Heart. He also got his wish.

GENERAL RICHARD CODY, U.S. ARMY VICE CHIEF OF STAFF: Master Sergeant Daniel Robles, who has lost his leg in combat, has asked to stay in the Army.

You have my commitment, as vice chief of staff of the Army, that we will keep you in the Army as long as you want to stay.

All right?

(CHEERING AND APPLAUSE)

COOPER: For all that's happened, Robles says he's not bitter. He's simply thankful to be alive.

ROBLES: Consider the alternative. At least I'm here. I get to see my family grow. You know, it's nobody's fault. It's just something that happened. It's war.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Go fast, daddy.

ROBLES: Yes.

COOPER: A war that has left more than 23,000 service members wounded, men and women who will need this country's care for years to come.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: Two American heroes.

The number is only climbing, of course.

One more note on Fisher House, where Sergeant Reed's wife, Belinda (ph), stayed during his rehab: Two more were dedicated today, making four Fisher Houses here at this facility, homes away from home, literally, so that family members, already with enough to worry about, don't also have to worry about finding or paying for someplace to stay.

There are hundreds of amputee veterans returning home. Here's the "Raw Data."

We called the Pentagon, and here's what they told us. As of last month, amputations have been performed on 839 deployed troops. Seven hundred and thirty-one were from the war in Iraq. Of those, 480 service members suffered a major limb amputation. And the military defines that as losing a hand or an arm, a foot or a leg. The sad fact is, they will not be the last. Patients arrive here every day. It is a fact of war. There are allegations tonight that our leaders and lawmakers did not see it coming, that they treated their sacred duty to America's wounded as if it were business as usual.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER (voice-over): Senator Clinton on supporting wounded troops.

(on camera): I want to read you something Paul Begala was quoted as saying. He said, "It's an obscenity that a government that can find billions in no-bid contracts for Halliburton and billions in tax cuts for the wealthy cannot find a few million dollars to bind up the wounds of its heroes."

CLINTON: And I say, amen. You know, there's no oversight, no accountability. It's the first time we have had a war where, literally, the government has been given a blank check and the Congress didn't do its job.

COOPER: But she's in Congress, too. So, how does she plan to be part of the solution, not the problem? -- ahead on 360, "The Toughest Battle: Healing Heroes."

(END VIDEOTAPE)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

COOPER: This is a shooting simulator. It's a high-tech way for soldiers who have been given prosthetic limbs to relearn how to shoot using these specially adapted rifles.

CAPTAIN SCOTT KULLA, U.S. ARMY: This is an M-4. It's the same thing they're using out on the front lines. As a person gets prepared to engage the targets...

COOPER: Right.

KULLA: ... I would give the commands from the chamber to lock and load and prepare to watch the scenario.

COOPER: OK.

KULLA: As they watch the scenario, they have to then pick out from the crowd who the shooter is...

COOPER: Mm-hmm.

KULLA: ... and who the next viable target is. And, as they do, they would draw on this weapon.

There you go. (END VIDEO CLIP)

COOPER: Just one of the many high-tech rehabilitation tools here at the Center for the Intrepid. It really is a remarkable facility. It cost some $50 million, all of it from private donations, some 600,000 Americans giving what they could, some schoolkids giving $1 here or there, other corporations giving, obviously, much larger sums.

As we said, Senator Hillary Clinton took part in today's dedication ceremony for the Center for the Intrepid. This -- this state-of-the art facility that is a reminder, really, that more than 22,000 Americans have been wounded in Iraq, many of them severely.

Senator Clinton is, of course, running for president in 2008.

And, yesterday, at a town hall meeting in Iowa, she stepped up her criticism of President Bush.

Take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLINTON: This was his decision to go to war. He went with an ill-conceived plan and an incompetently executed strategy. And we should expect him to extricate our country from this before he leaves office.

(APPLAUSE)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

COOPER: Well, Senator Clinton didn't mince words yesterday. And she didn't hold back today either when we talked.

More now from my interview with her, starting with the dedication ceremony earlier today.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: How moving was it for you to be here today?

CLINTON: Well, it was extremely moving, because we had several hundred wounded warriors from Iraq and Afghanistan who were really not only part of the ceremony, but the reason we are here.

This Center for the Intrepid is going to provide the highest rehabilitation services available, really, anywhere in the world, to our young men and women who have been wounded and come here to do everything they can to heal, regain as much mobility they can, and -- and lead as productive a life as they can.

COOPER: The center cost $50 million, raised by private funds, American citizens, some giving $1 here or there, others, large donations, this Fisher House also by private funds.

It says a lot about the American people. What does it say, though, about the American government? Why -- why are private funds needed to build a hospital like this?

CLINTON: That's a really good question, Anderson.

Obviously, we are unique in America, because we have the partnership between our government and our citizens, unlike anyone anywhere in the world. And we do meet needs that are not going to be met.

But this doesn't relieve the government of responsibility for doing everything we can to fund the VA, to make sure that, you know, every VA in the country is ready to prepare, welcome with the services that are necessary. So, one of the reasons why I fight so hard to get the VA funded is because that is a national obligation.

COOPER: You said this weekend the president is responsible to extricate the U.S. from Iraq before he leaves office. You said it would be irresponsible for him not to.

Do you mean that U.S. troops should be pulled out of Iraq by the time the next administration comes into power?

CLINTON: Well, what I mean is that it is the height of responsibility. For the president to say, as he said on several occasions, he is going to leave this to his successor -- this is his war. He conceived it poorly. He executed it incompetently. He's pursuing a strategy that is really more of the same.

COOPER: But using the word extricate, does that mean that you think U.S. troops should be out?

CLINTON: Well, you know, it's problematic to set a deadline. But I would like to see a process. I would like to see a strategy that is moving toward us beginning to move our troops, as I have called for, for more than a year-and-a-half.

COOPER: You have called for now a cap on the -- the number of troops, I think, the cap from January 1. Senator Obama called for a cap from January 10. Critics say, if -- if you believe that there haven't been enough troops heretofore, what does capping the number of troops do?

CLINTON: Well, the cap is meant to send a signal to the president, as is our efforts to get a resolution of disapproval, that he no longer has political support in the country and the Congress for pursuing this policy.

The cap is to literally cap the number of troops, so that we can begin, you know, redeploying them out of Iraq. And we have got to start somewhere. And this gives us a -- a way of making the argument that this president should not be adding troops. He should begin subtracting troops.

COOPER: Critics say, the signal that a cap and that this nonbinding resolution would send is a mixed signal to U.S. troops. Senator McCain says, whether or not it emboldens the enemy or not, it sends a mixed signal to American forces. CLINTON: Well, I respectfully disagree with that.

You know, I have spoken with a lot of our young men and women in uniform, and talked to a lot of them here today. The ones who have been there, they have been in battle. They have been wounded, many of them. They have seen the difficulties of trying to work with the Iraqis, who have not yet decided that they want to, you know, live in a peaceful, secure state, with everybody having a role and rights within it. What I hear is very different from what.

COOPER: The other criticism that's made -- Senator McCain made it today -- is that what you're not addressing is what happens when the U.S. redeploys or pulls out. If there is a genocidal bloodletting in Iraq, what then?

CLINTON: Well, this is a -- kind of a curious argument, because we need a comprehensive strategy.

Everyone that I know of who has studied this believes there is no military solution. There has to be a political component and an international component. I see very little evidence that the administration is making progress pushing the Iraqi government on the political front.

So, I don't see how we can expect just putting more troops in to really get us where we can avoid any kind of bad outcome, because we are not on a path to achieve that. We need to put more pressure on the Iraqi government, which is why I have said, if we are going to cut troops' funding, let's cut the funding for the Iraqi troops, or threaten to do so, to get their attention focused on what they have to do.

And, finally, we have to have an international process that looks at how to prevent what's happening in Iraq from spilling over. That means not only bringing the countries together that we already have relations with and we are engaged with, but it means being engaged with countries that our president will not engage with.

You know, I don't understand this philosophy that you don't talk to bad guys. You know, we talked to the Soviet Union all during the Cold War. I think you have to engage with people who are your enemies, or your potential adversaries, in order to figure out what's on their mind.

COOPER: The president has said he looked in Vladimir -- Vladimir Putin's eyes, saw his soul. He has -- he has said al-Maliki is a stand-up guy; he's -- he's taken the measure of the man.

Do you think the president is a good judge of character?

CLINTON: I think the president has made a lot mistakes, and his judgment in the undertaking in Iraq, certainly, has not been borne out.

Obviously, he's also not brought the world together. We were united after 9/11. We have lost that unity. So, I regret deeply that he continues to go down the course that he has set, when there seems to be not only very little support left for it, but very little chance of it being a successful strategy.

COOPER: Final question, which again is on this point with Iran: Today, the president told NPR, "If Iran escalates its military actions in Iraq, to the detriment of our troops and/or innocent Iraqi people, we will respond firmly."

CLINTON: Well, you know, we are playing a very dangerous game of chicken here.

For domestic political consumption, the Iranians believe that they can, you know, continue to be belligerent and make outrageous claims against Israel, the United States, interfere with what's going on in Iraq.

We are standing back here, you know, threatening and pointing fingers. And I think we are hearing a lot of the same rhetoric we heard before the president's decision to launch a preemptive war in Iraq.

COOPER: Do you think this president is preparing the ground for some sort of military action against Iran?

CLINTON: I don't -- I don't know. I don't know. I think that we in the Congress are going to have a lot of questions about that.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

COOPER: I also sat down with Senator John McCain, who has a very different view of how long American troops should remain in Iraq. What does he really think about the advice President Bush is getting from Vice President Dick Cheney? My interview with Senator McCain -- next on 360.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MCCAIN: The war in which you have fought has divided the American people. But it has divided no American in their admiration for you and from our obligation to you. We all honor you.

(APPLAUSE)

"American Morning," CNN, 1/29/2007

M. O'BRIEN: Presidential politics now. The first voting may be a year away, but the candidates are campaigning hard, jockeying for attention and money. Or at least most of them.

The Hillary Rodham Clinton campaign descended on Iowa over the weekend, and the former first lady drew huge crowds and at least one big laugh.

CNN's Candy Crowley is on the trail.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CANDY CROWLEY, CNN SR. POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT (voice over): Giuliani courts New Hampshire. Richardson worked Reno. Kucinich takes his heart to San Francisco. And former governor Mike Huckabee joins the Republican roster.

The '08s were out in force this weekend, but the greatest of forces was a Hillary-fest in Iowa.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Woe. Thank you.

CROWLEY: Election eve-size coverage and standing-room-only crowds, mostly adoring crowds with the occasional tough question: How, she was asked, having voted for the war does she propose to end it?

CLINTON: The president has said this is going to be left to his successor, and I think it's the height of irresponsibility, and I really resent it. This was his decision to go to war. He went with an ill-conceived plan and an incompetently-executed strategy, and we should expect him to extricate our country from this before he leaves office.

(APPLAUSE)

CROWLEY: From the theaters, to the banners, to the lighting, this is a campaign in full swing, where celebrity status brings in the crowds and little is left to chance. All of which makes one odd moment all the odder. The question was about her ability to stand up to dictators.

CLINTON: And in the gentleman's words, we face a lot of evil men. You know? People like Osama bin Laden comes to mind. And what in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?

CROWLEY: Why were they laughing, and what did she have in mind? She bristled at the suggestion it was her husband.

CLINTON: I thought I was funny. You know, you guys keep telling me, lighten up, be funny. You know, I get a little funny and now I'm being psychoanalyzed.

CROWLEY: Whatever, mostly this was a flawless maiden voyage for the senator from New York.

CLINTON: Thank you all very much.

REMARKS BY SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON AT A TOWN HALL MEETING, 1/29/2007

LOCATION: EAST HIGH SCHOOL COMMUNITY CENTER, DES MOINES, IOWA

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you everyone. (Cheers, applause.)

Well, I'm Hillary Clinton. (Laughter, applause.) And I am so happy to be here in Iowa, to be here and part of this extraordinary experience that we're blessed to have -- our American democracy -- and it starts right here in Iowa. (Cheers, applause.) And I'm running for president and I'm in it to win it! (Cheers, applause.)

And I intend to do it the old-fashioned way. I intend to come and talk with you and listen to you in your living rooms, and your church basements, and your union halls -- wherever you gather -- because I want to have a conversation about the future of our country. And I want to share with you my ideas, my vision, but I want to hear from you what you think we should be doing. I want to have this as a one-on-one conversation -- just you and me and about several hundred national press people. (Laughter.) But I have to tell you, that will fade and we'll actually be able to pursue this conversation in a very personal way.

You know, I'm running for president because I want to renew the promise of America. (Applause.) And being here at this great historic high school -- (cheers, applause) -- with your principal -- Mike, thank you for being here and being so helpful. (Applause.) I also want to thank East High Activities Coordinator Sharon Link, who worked really hard to make this happen. (Cheers, applause.) I want to thank the East High School Jazz Band under the direction of Chris Strohmaier. (Cheers, applause.) And the East High School 2006-2007 Color Guard under the direction of Michelle Eggleston (sp). (Applause.)

You know, when I saw those young women bringing forth our flag, it always has the same effect on me. You know, we have so much to be proud of. We have the greatest country in the world. (Applause.) We are so blessed, but we cannot take that for granted and I fear that that's what's been happening. We have been reversing the progress that so many of us have enjoyed.

You know, I'm a middle-class family in the middle of America. I was born in Chicago. (Cheers, applause.) I was raised in a suburb and my dad was a World War II vet -- like some of you who are here today. And he believed in the basic bargain that American offered: You work hard, you play by the rules, you do what you can to further your own life -- your country's going to be on your side. Your country's going to stand with you, back you up, and you'll be able to provide a better future for your children. I mean, that's the way I was raised. I was raised to believe in that basic bargain, to believe in that promise.

And I don't think that I need to tell you that it seems as though some in power in our country have forgotten that. (Applause.) That indeed, they seem to have overlooked the historical fact that America is great because we have provided opportunity for everyone, because we created the American middle class, out of which many of us came and still are proudly a part of, because we understood that, with all due respect, there are rich people everywhere in the world, aren't there? And unfortunately, there are poor people anywhere in the world. What is unique about America is that we've created this phenomenon where the vast majority of us had a chance to live far beyond the dreams and hopes of our parents or our grandparents.

And now I see that at risk. I see that the promise of America is being undermined by bad decisions coming out of our government, by an ideology that disregards what it takes to provide the building blocks for families and hardworking individuals to feel as though they can have a better future for themselves and their children. You know, all you have to do is look at the headlines today. You know, CEO pay is skyrocketing to what I consider outrageous levels. (Applause.) Corporate profits are increasing. (Applause.) And productivity is up -- what's productivity? That's how hard the American worker works, and nobody works harder than American workers. We are the hardest working people in the world! (Applause.)

And yet, what's wrong with this picture? Wages aren't up. Income's not up. I'll tell you what is up: health care costs are up. (Applause.) Education costs are up. Energy costs are up. There's something wrong when you have more bankruptcies in America last year than college graduates. There's something wrong when hardworking people can't get the health care that they and their children need. (Applause.)

Now, I have worked my entire life on behalf of children and families, on behalf of women around the world as well as here at home. (Cheers, applause.) And I believe that I have a lifetime of experiences -- as well as qualifications from all the work that I've done -- that make me particularly well prepared to take office in January 2009. (Applause.)

Now, I know there are people who either say or wonder, would we ever elect a woman president? (Cheers, applause.) And you know, I don't think we'll know until we try. (Laughter.) And I'm going to try and with your help, I think we can do it! (Cheers, applause.) You know, but it is not just about breaking an historic barrier like that -- although that's what Americans are good at. We are good at breaking barriers and going places where nobody's ever gone before, and I want to see us get back to doing that. This is about figuring out what we're going to do together, because it's not only about leadership. We need strong leadership and smart solutions to deal with our problems, but we also need good citizenship. We need people who are willing to roll up their sleeves and work with us.

You know, when I was talking with Mike and some of the teachers before I came in -- we have to have a partnership. The schools can't do it on their own. We've got to help by getting families focused on what they can do to prepare their children for school. (Applause.) And you know, when you think about health care, the doctors and the nurses can't do it all by themselves. We've got to take better care of ourselves. We have to be more focused on staying well and preventing illness and disease. (Applause.) And you know, when you think about energy, we desperately need an energy policy that'll move us toward independence, but it's going to require that we change some of our habits. (Applause.) You know, I believe that we've got to be more conservation minded, more efficient. So this is the great partnership that exists in America between our government and our citizens. And we need to get back to that, because frankly, the conversation coming from Washington the last six years has been pretty one sided. It's all been in one direction. (Applause.)

So I am so excited about this campaign. I am looking forward to it. I'm delighted that my friend and colleague, Congressman Boswell, could be here with me today, because we go way back. (Applause.) But I just want to pledge to you that I will be here over and over again trying to meet with as many people as possible. You may not always agree with me. We may not, you know, see the world exactly the same, but I will tell you what I think. I will take your questions. I will try to figure out what we can do to find common ground and move forward together.

I really think our country is at a turning point. You know, we had a great run of it in the 20th century. Nobody could out compete us, nobody had a higher standard of living or quality of life, but we're in a new world now and we have not adjusted to that new competition. And I have been to some of the countries that are competing with us and I think we've got to do a much better job of being ready to get out there and win in the global economy. And that means we cannot cede advantage to our competitors. We have to be stronger here at home. And that means we've got to be willing -- (applause) -- to enforce trade agreements, to put labor and environmental standards in them, to make it clear to countries that take advantage of our markets that we're not going to be patsies any longer. (Applause.) We're going to stand up for America! (Applause.)

So when people tell me, well, you know, I don't think a woman can be elected president, I say, well, I don't believe that, but we're going to find out. And when people tell me, you know, I don't think America can really face up to its problems, deal with this new global environment, make the hard decisions, I say, don't you count us out. We may not have had good leadership the last six years, but we are still the best, most able can-do country in the world! (Cheers, applause.)

So thank you for being here and packing this gymnasium. I stopped at the overflow room in another gymnasium and the principal told me there were 1,000 people there and I was so sorry they couldn't get in here, but we would have to layer people on top of you and I didn't think that was a good idea. But thank you for being here. And now let the conversation begin! And I welcome your questions on issues that are on your mind.

Thank you all so much for being here! (Applause.) Thank you all. Thank you.

I'll try to get to as many questions as I can. I'll try and do it on a 360-degree circle here so I don't leave people out. Let me start right there -- and I think we have a microphone, because it'll be hard otherwise to hear.

Hello?

Q Hi. Great. Thank you.

Good afternoon, Senator Clinton, and thank you so much for being here. We are thrilled. I am so excited that there is a female candidate running for president in the White House. And it's about time, if not past time, that we had a woman president in the White House.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you. (Cheers, applause.)

Q The 43 people, though, that have had your job before you -- your future job -- have all been men. And my question is, how is your campaign prepared to tackle that issue? Thank you.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, it is a fact that our political system has been dominated, until recently, by men and by white men. But over the time of the last 50 years, look at what's happened: We've had an increase in political participation and people running for office from different ethnic and racial groups, and certainly from women.

We now have 16 women in the United States Senate. (Cheers, applause.) And we work together, we support each other. We don't always agree, because we come from different places in the country. We have different political points of view.

But those 16 of us that are there today are as many as have ever served previously, because there have only been 32. So you see, we're at a point where the numbers are increasing. And think of what it felt like when you saw Nancy Pelosi become the speaker of the House of Representatives. (Cheers, applause.)

Now I don't think I'm the only woman here who feels that sometimes you have to work even harder, right? (Applause.) And I am prepared to do that. I will work as hard as I can in this campaign. But let's remember the most important thing is what happens in January 2009. The campaign has to be a beginning that leads to an agenda that can bring a majority of Americans together so that I can make the tough decisions we're going to confront, because I fear that our current president and vice president are going to leave a pretty big whole to be dug out of. (Applause.)

And so -- oh, I expect they'll probably be more stories about my clothes and hair than some of the people running against me. (Laughter.) And I just have accepted that. (Applause.) And you know, there may be some other kind of funny stories about differences between us, or -- you know, a little bit of the double standard, but I just reject that. You know, I think we've got to move beyond that. I am going to be asking people to vote for me based on my entire life and experience. The fact that I'm a woman, the fact that I'm a mom, is part of who I am. But I'm going to ask people to vote for the person they believe will be the best president for the United States of America. (Applause, cheers.)

Q Go girl!

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.) Go with me! (Laughs.)

Q Hi. I'm Alan Coswell (sp) and I'm a local physician and also the state president of the American Diabetes Association here. And diabetes and obesity is the fastest growing cost increase in our health care costs. There's two questions I have, both related to this. What are you going to do about getting universal health insurance? And secondly, what are you going to do about the crisis in obesity and diabetes in the United States?

SEN. CLINTON: Doctor, those are great questions. Thank you. (Applause.)

I am committed to universal health care coverage. (Applause, cheers.) And I believe -- I believe that we finally are creating a consensus in our country for that goal. You know, I remember all too well back to '93 and '94 -- (laughter) -- and I understand how hard it is. But I think we as a nation now have so many more years of experience.

The problems we were trying to address back then are still with us -- in fact, they're worse. We have even more uninsured Americans. We have more and more businesses feeling under tremendous global competitive pressure and are cutting back and even cutting out health care. We continue to spend more than any other country in the world -- you know, we spend 16 percent of our entire national income on health care. The next highest spending country -- either Canada or Switzerland -- spends about 11 percent of their income. That's an $800 billion difference.

And yet when you look at quality indicators from around the world, we often don't do the best job. Diabetes is a perfect example of that because our patchwork of systems is a system for sickness, not for wellness. (Applause.)

And so with respect -- with respect to diabetes, which is a very fast-growing cost in our health care system -- last time I looked, I think 20 percent of our Medicaid costs -- every dollar spent on Medicaid -- 20 percent is related to diabetes. Think about that. And what the doctor is attempting to cope with is the fact that an insurance company is unlikely to pay for the preventive maintenance care of someone with diabetes. It's hard to get an insurance company to pay for that visit to the podiatrist or to the nutritionist. (Applause.) But they will pay if you have to have your foot amputate. I mean, our -- the incentives in our system are upside down and backwards. (Applause.)

So part of what -- part of what we have to do is bring everybody together. We need our doctors, our nurses, our hospital administrators, we need our employers, we need our faith community, we need public officials -- we need everybody to face up to the fact that we are having a crisis in our health care system. It is not going to get better unless we act. And we have to cover everybody, we have to improve quality, and we have to contain costs so that the money can be better directed.

So I'm going to start by introducing legislation to insure every child. (Applause.) That is what I think we have to begin with. (Applause.) When I was in the White House, I worked to help craft the Children's Health Insurance Program, and it has worked extremely well. But now the administration has begun to cut it back and children are losing coverage, and we have chronically ill children who are really facing some tough decisions that are terrible choices for them and their caregivers.

So I think if we can start with this Congress and this president to insure children, that would be a good beginning. Then I want to build on that and I want to, as part of our conversation across Iowa, talk to you about ideas I have and hear from you, because there are several ideas that I think would work. And I've been very pleased to see states moving in that direction and have bipartisan support for reforms, which we really need. So I'm going to come forward with some ideas, but I want to hear from you.

But I want to point out someone who is very precious to me and who really embodies this debate for me. Back in 1994, I was at an event talking about health care and especially talking about the terrible expenses and consequences families with seriously ill children face. I've done a lot of work in children's hospitals; I've been on the board of a children's hospital; I gave all the money I made from "It Takes a Village" to children's hospitals and children's charities -- (applause) -- and so for me this is intensely personal.

So I was at this event and I was talking, Doctor, about everything we needed to do to try to reform health care. And there was this young boy just smiling at me. I mean, his smile lit up the whole room. And so at the end of it he -- I came over toward him, he put his hands up, and I reached down to lift him up, and he was in a body cast. And that's how I met Ryan Moore (sp).

Ryan was born with a rare form of dwarfism, and he and his family faced unbelievable medical expenses. And I have stayed in touch with Ryan and his mom Marla (sp) and his father Brian and their family -- his brother Caden (sp) is here today. They live in Nebraska. They live in South Sioux City, Nebraska. And I wrote about Ryan in my book, "Living History," because he just won my heart. And Ryan's here with me today, and I'm so proud, because his family was able, with terrible effort and with lots of obstacles from insurance companies, to give Ryan the medical care he needed, and he and his mom have stayed in touch with me. And Ryan is now at the University of South Dakota, where, I might add, he is a 4.0 student. (Applause.)

You know, so for me, this is not about abstractions. This is not about some debate that takes place somewhere else. This is about Ryan. This is about the many, many children and adults whom I know personally.

My office in the Senate -- we handle so many cases because somebody has a sick child or a sick relative and the insurance company won't pay for the treatment that they need. There was a man who called my office a few years ago and he was from up in the north country -- I'm going to talk to you all about New York sometime, too, because guess what -- there are farms in New York and small towns and villages. And so I got a call from this gentleman up in what we call the north country, and he told me about his son who was in desperate need of a certain operation. The insurance company said no. So we went to bat for him and we got him the permission to have the operation. But you know, as happy as I was to be able to take care of him, I thought, what a sad commentary that you have to go to a senator of the United States to get the treatment that you need for your child. We're going to change that. We're going to have universal health care. We're going to deal with obesity and with diabetes. (Cheers, applause.)

How about back here? We have to pass the mike back a little bit.

Q Hello? Yeah. Mrs. -- Ms. Clinton.

SEN. CLINTON: Yes, sir.

Q Very nice to see you.

SEN. CLINTON: Nice to see you.

Q I wish you luck. My name is John Berry (sp). I was a veteran in the first war. And I understand with these 21,000 or 22,000, do you know if there will be any more or will we be able to kind of curve this war? I was there -- I mean, I wasn't there at 9/11, but I saw it on TV like most people.

SEN. CLINTON: Right.

Q And so I guess that's all I have for my question. And by the way, we as America love you and I think you look very nice. (Cheers, applause.)

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you! (Laughs.) Thank you. Thank you so much for your service. I really appreciate it. (Applause.) Thank you. Thank you.

We are going to have to fund our VA health care system to take care of our veterans. There is no ifs, ands or buts about it. (Applause.) And you know, I was in one of our military hospitals just about two weeks ago, and I was talking to a lot of the doctors and the nurses that were taking care of our wounded heroes coming back from Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, and they get great care. And when they get to the VA system now, the care is so much better than it was. I'm very proud of the work that was done during the Clinton administration to improve the VA system. (Applause.)

But we have had to fight every year to keep it funded. You know, it just defies my understanding how we could have taken a balanced budget and a surplus that this president inherited in 2001 -- (applause) -- I mean, we've squandered it. We have squandered it. We haven't met the challenges that we face and the responsibilities we have, such as taking care of our veterans. So I can pledge to you that I will continue to fight for the next two years in the Senate to fund our VA system, to make sure we don't close hospitals and clinics that are needed by our returning vets. And I hope we'll get to a point when I'm president where we can have guaranteed funding for our VA system and we don't have to fight for the dollars that are needed to take care of the people who are taking care of us. (Applause.)

Q I've got your book, "It Takes a Village." I had the first copy and I bought this one recently. It's delicious.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you. (Laughs.) Thank you so --

Q Will you autograph it for me?

SEN. CLINTON: I will certainly autograph it after we're finished. You just -- you stay around. I will autograph it.

Q Hillary!

SEN. CLINTON: Yes, up there. One of the folks up in the bleachers.

Q Hello!

SEN. CLINTON: Hi.

Q I'm from Chicago! (Applause.) I was born on the south side, grew up in the north suburbs. I have a friend of mine went to high school with you and slept over with you at sleepovers. (Laughter.) Yeah.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I hope she doesn't talk too much. (Laughter.)

Q I don't think she ever put your underwear in the freezer.

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.)

Q Aside from that, Senator Clinton, I'm a teacher.

And -- (applause) -- I've really become an Iowan. I came to Iowa to get a teaching job because when I started, there were a lot of teachers out there. So I came to Iowa to get my job. Unfortunately, we are losing teachers. One, because of pay. Iowa -- I am very proud to be a teacher -- this is my 30th year, and I do teach raging, pubescent, hormonal individuals. (Laughter.) They are 8th graders, 7th graders, and the hard thing is, I am going through menopause. (Laughter.) But I love them.

My concern is that Iowa -- we have such a wonderful record with our education. But yet, our pay for teachers ranks very, very low. And when I see that our young men are being sent to Iraq, and all that money going over there, I think about, as you mentioned earlier, Senator, it takes a village to raise the child. But if we don't have the money, how do we build that village to raise the child? (Applause.)

SEN. CLINTON: Excellent. Excellent point. Well, first, let me thank you for your years of teaching, and let me thank all of the teachers and the -- (applause) -- you know, administrators, educators who are here. I know how dependent I have always been on my teachers. I mean, I can go back and talk about every one of the teachers I had, starting in kindergarten, what they did for me and how fortunate I was to have such high-quality committed teachers.

And you make three points that I really want to underscore. First, if we don't do more to incentivize people to go into and stay in teaching, we are not going to have the teachers we need for the 21st century because too many of our teachers -- (applause) -- have been there a number of years. You know, you've taught 30 years, and I have friends who are going on 35 years and, you know, they still love it. But time's passing by, and we need to bring in more people from other professions and walks of life, as well as young people.

Now how do you do that? Well, you've got to make teaching attractive. And it is a calling. In a lot of people -- I saw two young women at the Drake Diner last night, and they introduced themselves to me and said they were teachers, and how they felt called to teach. One young girl said, "I was, you know, in third grade when I felt I wanted to be a teacher." So it is a calling, but it's also a way of life that has to provide a living. And so we've got to figure out how to make the mix between needing to recruit and retain our teachers and providing the resources necessary to be competitive so that teachers will be able to stay teaching and make a life commitment.

Now -- (applause) -- now I've only been in the state about a day now, about 24 hours. But I've already heard a lot about "no child left behind." (Boos.) You know, now the idea behind it was not a bad idea. But the way it's been executed, like a lot of things with this administration, has sure left a lot to be desired, hasn't it? And -- (applause) -- and one of the reasons is it's never been funded the way that was supposed to be funded, and that it was promised to be funded. (Applause.)

So we're going to be reauthorizing that, but it means we're going to have to take another look at it and see what to do with it. And I think you'll see some positive changes coming out of our Democratic Congress now, and I hope that that will help to provide more resources to the local schools. I mean, this is all about the magic that goes on between the teacher and a student. This is all about that "aha" moment, that learning, turning some young person on to something that'll be a passion, and maybe their life's work. And you can't dictate that from on high, you can't write laws about that because it's not just about what goes on inside the buildings or the school.

Now this school is a real testament to not only the history, the proud legacy, but it has kept up with the times. And I am so impressed with your new addition, and one of the reasons that could happen here is because at the end of the Clinton administration, President Clinton teamed up with Senator Harkin to pass money to be able to be handed down so that we could begin to repair and rebuild and modernize our school buildings by helping local communities that were under a lot of property tax and other pressures.

So I know that -- (applause) -- I know that Senator Harkin was instrumental in that. He and I have been working on legislation to try to reinstate that because, obviously, as soon as the new administration came in, that was ended. So then, you don't get any federal help to do some of the things you have to do, you don't get enough of the federal money promised to be able to fulfill the federal mandates that have been put down on you. So we've got to flip this, and we've got to get back to focusing on the educational enterprise.

And there's something else I just want to add quickly about that. This is a partnership. Families and students have to be partners with their teachers. They have to be willing -- (applause) -- to prepare their children for school. And, you know, I know how hard it is. And hard-working families, thank you all for raising the minimum wage here. Thanks to your new governor. Thanks to your new Democratic legislature. (Applause.) You know, when you've got a hard-working parent -- maybe a single mom, and you say, "Well you should read to your child at night," you know, that's a little hard, right? But we've got to figure out through all kinds of outreach, maybe using our churches and mentoring programs and all the rest of it. We've got to figure out how we can help better prepare our children. That's one of the reasons I support pre-school for disadvantaged kids, so they can have a good start -- (applause) -- and I support Head Start so they can get to school, ready to learn. So there's a lot we need to do.

Yes?

Q I'll just talk loud.

SEN. CLINTON: I can hear you. (Laughter.) Q: I think -- I'm a social worker, and we just heard from a teacher. (Applause.) And I think part of the issue is that work that's typically been women's work is so undervalued. Teaching, nurses, and it's just beginning. (Laughter.) As a nurse, as a teacher, child care providers.

SEN. CLINTON: That's right.

Q Social workers.

Q All predominantly women.

SEN. CLINTON: That's right.

Q And I feel like we need to do something about (that foot ?).

SEN. CLINTON: Right.

Q And even the governor -- government does not pay -- obviously does not pay teachers well. I don't believe that it pays social workers well.

Q Iowa has the lowest-paid nurses in the state.

SEN. CLINTON: Wow. Wow.

Q -- in the United States.

MS. : How do we change the culture to value -- (cross talk) -- taking roles that women take?

SEN. CLINTON: The -- great question. How do we change the culture to value caretaking roles and jobs that women primarily perform? Nurses, social workers, teachers, child care workers -- you can just imagine all of the personal work that's done to take care of our children, our elderly, each other.

Well, I think there are a couple of things we need to do. One, I have legislation to expand the enforcement of the Equal Pay Act, because I believe that -- (applause) -- that we passed the legislation some time ago, and women have made progress. And I'm very proud of that. But it is still not equitable, and I think we should because this is not just a women's issue. This is a family issue.

You know, when a woman goes into the workplace, if she's married, that adds to the income of the family. If she's the single support of herself, her children, or maybe an elderly relative, then why shouldn't she be treated fairly in the workplace to get the pay that she deserves? (Applause.) But there is not just a legal aspect to this, because when I came out and said I wanted to do this, you know, there were those who criticized and said, "Well, no, I mean, women choose to go into those professions, they are lower-paid professions, so in a sense, you're getting what you bargained for because of what you've done. And women have different life patterns, and the reason women don't get paid more is because we take time out to have children or to care for an elderly relative, the kinds of things that are part of the caretaking role that we assume."

So I thought about that for a minute, then I thought, "You know, that's a really curious argument, because if you look at the top levels of society -- you look at big corporations, you look at our great universities, there is still pay equity there, too." You know, MIT did a survey comparing tenured professors -- men and women. What did they find? They found their women tenured professors, who are the most educated -- obviously the most advanced degrees -- these are women who never got off the track, they've stayed focused on doing what they were intending to do -- there were disparities: disparities in pay, disparities in other conditions within the university, and to their credit, they took it on. So there is a cultural component to this.

So, you know, we can change laws, but we also have to change attitudes. We've got to get people to treat each other with respect, no matter what our gender, no matter what our background. We've got to look at each other and see each as a precious human being and treat each other with fairness and compassion. (Applause.)

Yes?

Q First I want to --

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughter.)

It'll probably start -- yeah.

Q Okay. No, wait. It's not working.

SEN. CLINTON: Oh.

Q Okay, this is better.

SEN. CLINTON: Good.

Q First, I want to say that in researching your background, I'm -- I've got to say I admire your advocacy for children, for women, for people who are disadvantaged. You started being an advocate for children through the welfare system in the Department of Human Services. And as a foster parent, I've got a question for you.

I have -- my wife and I have been foster parents in two different states in this country, and we found that there's this big hodgepodge -- you know, mish-mash of rules and regulations, and things that people do and the rights that children have, the rights that the families have. In some states, the parent who is not custodial can grab the child, run to another state and be perfectly immune to any type of prosecution. Do you think it's possible, and would you favor a plan to kind of get some cohesion to this nationwide and take this to the national level instead of just leaving it to the states to fend as they will?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, first of all, thank you and your wife for being foster parents. You know -- (applause) -- thank you.

I started out way back in law school defending the rights of foster children. And it has been an issue that I have worked on my entire public career. I feel very strongly about this. You know, obviously, we never want to break up a family. But there are some families, because of the way they treat their children or because of their inability to care for their children, who present such dangers to their children, such neglect, that unfortunately, the state comes in and takes those children. When that happens, every one of us becomes the family of that child. When someone is removed from an abusive home or a neglectful situation, taken into the state, that becomes our child. And what we want to do is try to return the child to his family, if possible. Sometimes we can, and lots of times we can't.

We have nearly 500,000 children in foster care in our country, a lot of them very, very young. So we need a system that moves more quickly to make a decision about their future. If they can be returned home, if the parents can be worked with, we need to do that. We also need to give more respect to grandparents. If a grandparent can take a child, then let's not turn the child over to strangers, let's put the child in with the grandparents. (Applause.) So I've worked on this very hard.

When I was First Lady, we worked on providing more incentives for adoption and tried to provide more funding for the foster care system. And we improved the number of children going into adoption so they could have permanent homes. But unfortunately, we were like running in place because more and more children kept coming in. I've been working in the Senate to try to do exactly what you're talking about. Let's have a more cohesive, coherent system because if the child is taken away in one state, that child may languish in foster care for years, and then the child becomes unadoptable, there's no permanent home, whereas in the state next door, if he'd been taken into foster care, there would have been a big effort undertaken to either return him or free him for adoption.

So I do think we need to have a national approach to this because these children are too precious. They are our children, and we need more good people like you to be foster parents to them until we have a better system to take care of them. And I will continue to work on that.

Thank you very much. (Applause.) Oh, my goodness. See those up there?

Q Okay. First I'd like to say, like, what a great honor it is to see you and ask a question cause you're one of my idols and -- yeah. So --

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you. (Applause.)

Q -- this will be the first time voting in a presidential election, and as a young person I'm very concerned with global warming and -- (applause) -- what are your plans on enforcing alternative energy sources?

SEN. CLINTON: Great question. Thank you -- thank you and -- (applause) -- I am so encouraged and excited by our young people. I hope you feel as I do we have the best young people in the entire world. They are fabulous and -- (applause) -- they are becoming so active around a couple of issues, and one of them is global climate change and alternative energy.

Let me just briefly say that I think we're going to finally be able to address this to some extent in the Congress. Up until now, it's been very difficult because, you know, the president and the vice president refuse to admit that there were any, you know, human contributions to global climate change. There are climactic changes that are so-called natural, but we have so changed the atmosphere that it has a kind of ripple effect.

So it's sort of like yes, there are natural reasons why the climate may get warmer, but we've put so much CO₂ into the atmosphere that that changes the natural forces, and so on and so forth. So, of course, global climate change is real and it is a threat. Now what we have to do is create the political consensus, which we're working on now, to get the private sector in America to support these changes, and to get the politics to change itself so that we can make laws that will improve our conditions.

There are several things that I am advocating. I believe we've got to take a strong stand on limiting our dependence on foreign oil, and we have -- (applause) -- we have a perfect example right here in Iowa about how it can work with all of the ethanol that's being produced here and -- (applause) -- and -- and there -- now across the country lots of work being done to create what's called cellulosic ethanol out of things other than corn. And in our state of New York, I've been working with one of our universities to do that with fast growing willow and we can use, you know, farm waste and other homegrown elements to begin to power our cars -- to change the way that we use gasoline.

But we also have to look to our car manufacturers to get higher gas mileage in our cars and -- (applause) -- you know, there are ways of doing that that are not going to further undercut our auto industry, but they've got to be willing to do it. And I hope that in this next year we're going to see more willingness on the part of our president and our Congress. The president can do some things, as he said in the State of the Union, but I think we can do even more than that.

I also think we've got to change the way we produce electricity. We've got to clean up our old coal-burning utilities and get them to be cleaner because they're spewing so much mercury and CO₂ in the air. (Applause.) So I propose what I call a strategic energy fund that would be funded by taking away the subsidies from the oil companies. I don't believe we should be subsidizing the major oil companies -- (applause) -- and -- (applause) -- if we took that money and put it into the strategic energy fund, we could massively invest in the best ideas to further biofuels and biodiesel and get solar cheaper and more commercially available and make wind more accessible and look at geothermal and look at hydropower, look at all of the alternatives. (Applause.)

But I think this will take a public private/partnership and I was very happy the other day to see some of our biggest industrial companies like GE stand up and say to the government -- our government -- "Please impose standards and caps on the amount of CO₂ going into the air." That was a very important announcement because then we can turn to the administration and the Republicans in Congress and say, "Your supporters -- big business leaders of some of the great companies in America -- now are willing to do what you will not do, which is to put the United States back into the lead on controlling the climate change debate. We have been missing in action and we're going to get back and do what needs to be done. (Applause.) Yeah?

REP. LEONARD BOSWELL (D-IA): Senator -- Senator --

SEN. CLINTON: Oh.

REP. BOSWELL: They tell me that you've got to get on the road to Cedar Rapids and since I got to do the dirty work, they sent me up here so -- (laughter) --

SEN. CLINTON: Well, let -- let me take just a few more questions, Mike. Is that okay?

REP. BOSWELL: (Off mike) all right. It's fine.

SEN. CLINTON: So we'll be --

REP. BOSWELL: You're the boss.

SEN. CLINTON: If -- if you know anybody in Cedar Rapids, tell them I may be a little bit late. Yes?

Q Thank you. Hello. Thank you. I'm -- I'm Allan (sp) Young and I'm a teacher of middle school students. One of my former students, Sara (sp) Hathaway, right there, asked the question --

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughter.)

Q -- and I'm also fortunate enough to be the elected president of the Des Moines Education Association here so -- (applause) -- we of course are very concerned about education and the direction of education that has been influenced quite heavily we think in the negative direction by the current version of the Elementary Secondary in -- excuse me, Elementary and Secondary Education Act, which we call No Child Left Behind.

We certainly know that professional pay is very important, but one of the fundamental flaws that we think that are in that law is that there's not been much professional say about those closest to the children and what really teaching and learning is about. Certainly the notion that student learning is not necessarily equal to test scores is something that we would like for you to take back to the education committee as senator -- (applause) -- and also that our kids are whole kids -- that they have to have all their parts develop, not just narrow reading and math. (Applause.)

Q Our concern is that while the slogan itself sounds very good to not leave children behind -- we all believe in that slogan -- it's not just been an empty promise. It's also based on really flawed premises, and I guess we would hope that we would not be too quick to reauthorize it as is, and that we really talk about the language and framing that is in there that is really meant to push towards privatization of schools and vouchers and other things like that -- (applause) -- and that -- and that we could also then talk about really returning our -- our schools back to the places where we develop human beings and citizens who thrive in a democratic society in a diverse changing world, and not just there to improve their test scores. And so I'd like to hear from you about that. (Applause.)

SEN. CLINTON: Well, thank you so much for -- (applause) -- well, I think that the analysis you just laid out is very persuasive because test scores do not equate with learning. Test scores should not be used to define the worth of any child. Test scores -- (applause) -- test scores are a snapshot of a moment in time and they should be used as a diagnostic tool, because I do believe in accountability. I believe that we've got to figure out whether kids are learning and what more we need to do to incentivize their learning and try to help them become the people God meant them to be.

But what has happened under this relentless pressure on test scores is exactly as you described. We have essentially limited the access and experience that our children have, and this goes back to the doctor's first question. One of the reasons I would argue that we have an increase in obesity is we no longer have physical education. We no longer let our kids go to playgrounds, play outside, have that experience. (Applause.) You know, so, you know, you've got -- you've got to see life holistically, and we've taken children and basically said, "There's only one way to learn, and here it is and we're going to test you on it."

So what does that do for the children who are artistically inclined? Or what does it do for the children who are imaginative and need some time to develop their skills and their understanding of life and so -- (applause) -- so here's my plea. I have been working on school reform issues since 1983, when my husband asked me to chair a committee in Arkansas. And we came up with a lot of ideas and that -- the debate has gone on ever since then.

But what's happening is that we're not really hitting the targets we even set, and I would argue some of those targets are the wrong targets, but we're not even hitting those. We are not increasing the number of young people going into math and science. We're not turning out more engineers and researchers to compete with China and India. So we've got to rethink this and that's what I hope we can do with the No Child Left Behind debate that's going on in the Congress.

Now I, you know, I'm really conflicted here cause there are so many hands up and I promise I will be back and I will answer questions. But the other thing I will do if I can is stay here. We'll let people go because you've been so patient. I will stay right here as long as I can. If I didn't get to your question or if you brought something for me to autograph, you come on up and I will continue the conversation.

Thank you all very much. (Applause.)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON DELIVERS REMARKS AT THE OPENING OF THE CENTER FOR THE INTREPID, BROOKE ARMY MEDICAL CENTER, 1/29/2007

CLINTON: Thank you so much. It's an honor to be here back in San Antonio and to be part of this extraordinary celebration, because that's, indeed, what it is.

John Mellencamp reminded us that that's America. It really sums up that this could not happen anywhere else in the world.

There is no other country that has responded time and time again to the cause of freedom like ours.

There is no other country that has embodied the best virtues of humanity like ours.

And there is no other country that has been so well-served by those who have fought for our freedom and exemplified those virtues than ours.

We are blessed to have so many who have given so much. But in return, we are obligated to ensure in every way we can that they and their families are given the support they have so richly earned and deserved.

The Fisher family has understood that now for many years. And I am grateful for their leadership and example.

They have recognized that in our nation, as Arnold Fisher so eloquently said, it is not just the government that acts for us, although the government is us, in a democracy that's who we choose to represent us. But we are far more than that.

And through the kind of commitment that the Fisher family has exemplified and that so many of you have contributed to, we are able to open this Center for the Intrepid.

How well named it is. Those of you who may have been in New York perhaps have seen the Intrepid, have seen this brave, battered, but still proud symbol of America's commitment in wars, going back to World War II.

Its keel was laid at one week after Pearl Harbor, an attack that devastated our Navy and shocked our country. And the Intrepid was our first answer. It told our enemies that they may have damaged our ships, but not our spirit.

And so many service members served their country in good times and bad aboard the Intrepid, through war and peace, including my friend and colleague, Senator John McCain.

So we are here to celebrate once again that spirit, and to thank our wounded warriors and their families for the devotion to duty, honor and country that their lives exemplify.

CLINTON: We know that, for many of our wounded warriors, there will be a challenging road ahead. This center stands as a pledge, a solemn pledge of the healing and support our nation owes every one of you.

You remind us that the values that unite us far outweigh any differences that temporarily divide us, that, indeed, there is common ground on higher ground.

And on that higher ground, we stand today, to pay in full our debt to those who defend us, and to support one another, as we look, without fear, to the future.

May this center and the staff that serves so nobly here help all who pass through its doors to heal in body and soul, to look forward to a future that is still filled with potential, to live long and productive lives at home, and to continue, in whatever way you choose, to serve this nation that admires, respects and loves you.

We are eternally grateful.

May God continue to bless you and the great country you have served. Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

SEN. CARL LEVIN HOLDS A HEARING ON THE NOMINATION OF AD-MIRAL WILLIAM FALLON TO BE COMMANDER OF U.S. CENTRAL COMMAND, 1/30/2007

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome, Admiral. And welcome to your family. We are very pleased to have you before this committee. And I thank you for your years of distinguished service to our country.

I know that you are in the process of confirmation and that it may be difficult to give specific answers to some of these questions because you're not yet confirmed and you haven't had the opportunity to really get a firsthand view for yourself.

But if I could, Admiral, one of the issues that concerns me, and I think other members of this committee, regards the lack of unity of command for the Iraqi and U.S. forces that will be operating in and around Baghdad.

In fact, we've heard from both retired general Jack Keane and General Petraeus their concerns about what this means.

And I'm having trouble getting to the bottom of this, because General Petraeus sounded somewhat surprised about it and reflected some of his concerns, and General Keane, who apparently was very active in helping to devise the plan the president has put forth, also said that it was very dangerous and frustrating not to have unity of command.

Can you shed any light on this decision for our committee?

FALLON: Senator, not yet. But this is clearly a very significant, critical item. We've got to know exactly who's reporting to whom, for what purposes. And I would expect General Petraeus will have this at the top of his list when he gets out there.

There are ways to do this, as you well know, but we have got to make sure that the lines are straight if we're going to be effective.

CLINTON: I would appreciate that. And I welcome the openness that both you and General Petraeus have exhibited to the committee, and I hope that we can hear from both of you in short order about this.

I hope we can hear that it's been fixed, because some of the stories coming out of the fighting on Haifa Street, the recent large engagement near Najaf, have certainly raised serious questions about the Iraqi military's capacity to take actions which we thought they were capable of. And certainly we don't want to put our young men and women into harm's way with that level of confusion.

Secondly, Admiral, I asked General Petraeus -- this was really more of a plea; some would characterize it as a prayer; that we not send our new troops into Baghdad without being fully equipped and ready. There have been a number of articles in the last week, and there's one today in The Washington Post about how equipment for the added troops is lacking.

CLINTON: We are short thousands of vehicles, armor kits and other equipment. We do not have the capacity to quickly turn around that equipment and, in fact, Lieutenant General Speakes has said that we're going to have to be pretty much improvising, trying to share equipment, which I find deeply troubling.

I'm also concerned that the United States has agreed to sell 600 up-armored Humvees to Iraq this year for its security forces and, again quoting General Speakes, saying that, "Such sales better not be at the expense of the American soldier or Marine."

Again, Admiral, do you know anything yet about whether or not we're going to have the equipment for these additional combat brigades?

FALLON: Senator, I do not know the details of that. I can tell you that, in the Pacific Command, there's been a request made for us to look at the equipment that we have in this region and to send some of this to the Middle East -- equipment that might be appropriate to soldiers and Marines that are headed in that direction.

I know from my experience that the units are not all equipped in the same manner, particularly the Army units, which have a diverse background. Some are light infantry; some are heavier, and they have different types and varieties of vehicles.

I found it interesting from a professional side, when I was in Iraq, as I traveled around the country recently to note the differences between the units.

And the thought occurred to me that it would be interesting, and I'd like to find out the answers of just how one goes about using these different equipment sets in different situations; as we rotate troops from one area to another, how effective they are and so forth.

So I have it in the back of my mind, and would like to take this up with General Petraeus to do an assessment of what essential things are necessary to put our people in the best possible position.

So we'll do that as soon as we get...

CLINTON: I appreciate that, Admiral. And I would hope, perhaps, that the committee would send a very clear message to Secretary Gates and the Pentagon that we want that assessment done as quickly as possible, and that whatever actions need to be taken in order to provide the necessary equipment be done so.

I don't want to -- and I know every one of us doesn't want to -- hear stories about continuing lack of equipment costing American lives and injuries such as those we saw yesterday when we were both at San Antonio.

Finally, Admiral, this question about the diplomatic aspect of this assignment that you've undertaken is one that I'm very interested in, because we all know there's no military solution; there's no military solution in Iraq and there's no military solution in Afghanistan.

How do you see your role? And what tools do we have at our disposal, on the one hand to try to assess and rein in Iranian influence in the region and, on the other end of your area of responsibility, to create better relations and working conditions between Pakistan and Afghanistan?

Could you just briefly respond to those, please?

"ABC News Now Special Report," ABC, 2/1/2007

SENATOR CARL LEVIN (DEMOCRAT, MICHIGAN)

Thank you, Senator Inhofe. Senator Clinton.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And thanks to you General Casey, for your years of service. And thanks also to your family, because they have served along with you. And we're grateful to all of you. I want to follow up on the line of questioning Senator Inhofe was pursuing, because I have been concerned about the readiness level of units being deployed to Iraq. And in last year's Defense Authorization Bill, I authored an amendment that was included in the final bill that would require the Government Accountability Office to conduct a comprehensive assessment of the readiness of our ground forces within the Army and Marine Corps no later than June 1st of the this year.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

But even before that report is completed, there have been a series of disturbing reports that our troops do not have the equipment they need as they are being deployed to Iraq. At January 23rd, House Armed Services Committee hearing, stated, quote, 'We are in a dangerous, uncertain and unpredictable time,' unquote, and reiterated his concerns about the readiness levels of non-deployed combat units. Five Army combat brigade, five combat brigade teams are deploying to Iraq to support the proposed escalation of US forces there. These units are part of the pool of non-deployed combat units.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

And, General, I wanna ask a series of questions that follow up on our conversation yesterday in my office, because I know this is a grave concern to you and to all of us, are you, at this point, able to assert with a 100% level of confidence to this committee that every soldier being deployed to Iraq as part of this escalation will have all the necessary personal equipment?

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY (CHIEF OF STAFF NOMINEE)

Senator, that, that is my goal, and I know that's General Peter Schoomaker's goal. And we work very hard to ensure that that happens.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

Can you similarly assure us that every soldier being deployed as part of this escalation will receive all the necessary training for this dangerous assignment?

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY (CHIEF OF STAFF NOMINEE)

Again, that is, that is the objective that both General Schoomaker and I have stated to our organizations.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

And finally, will each and every soldier being deployed as part of this escalation have all the necessary force protection available to them to perform their mission?

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY (CHIEF OF STAFF NOMINEE)

And as I mentioned to you yesterday, I gave that guidance several weeks ago that that wouldn't in fact be the case.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

Now, according to yesterday's 'Business Week' summary of a new Department of Defense inspector general report, the - Inspector General is concerned that the US military has failed to adequately equip soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan, especially for non-traditional duties, such as training Iraqi security forces and handling detainees. The equipment shortages were attributed to basic management failures among military commanders in Iraq and Afghanistan, US Central Command lacks standard policies for requesting and tracking equipment requirements for units to perform their duties. General, have you seen this inspector general's report?

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY (CHIEF OF STAFF NOMINEE)

I have not, Senator.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask that the committee request a copy of the inspector general's report that was referred to in the 'Business Week' story, and that it be made available to the committee as soon as possible.

SENATOR CARL LEVIN (DEMOCRAT, MICHIGAN)

It will be requested and will be shared with everybody.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

General, as commander of US forces in Iraq, were you aware of the inspector general's investigation?

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY (CHIEF OF STAFF NOMINEE)

This is the Zinser's report or the...

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

Yes.

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY (CHIEF OF STAFF NOMINEE)

I am aware of a, a continuing inspector general process going on. I wasn't aware of this specific investigation. I know they are out there all the time doing a range of investigations.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

Do you know if any member of your command cooperated with this particular report?

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY (CHIEF OF STAFF NOMINEE)

I don't. But I, I assume they do, because they - they routinely work with the Zinser's in, in doing their reports.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

Could you report back to the committee what you find about the, the level of cooperating with this report, please?

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY (CHIEF OF STAFF NOMINEE)

I will, Senator.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

Thank you. Are you aware of the problems that are apparently cited in this report as, as set forth and press accounts of it?

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY (CHIEF OF STAFF NOMINEE)

I'm not. And I'm, I'm actually a little surprised at what - I think you said there was equipping of transition teams. And we, and I've, I've spent a lot of personal time making sure that these teams have the best equipment, and we don't, because they operate relatively independently. And we have gone to great lengths to make sure they have the equipment. And I go up and talk to each group as they come through. And I've not heard any mention of the transition teams being shortchanged on equipment.

SENATOR CARL LEVIN (DEMOCRAT, MICHIGAN)

Senator Clinton, if I could just interrupt, we did receive that IG report that you referred to, apparently last night. And it is now in our files. It is classified secret. So when you read it, if there are parts of that that we, or you would feel should be declassified, we'll make those requests. Sorry, sorry for the interruption.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

All right. No, I would appreciate that, Mr. Chairman, because earlier this week, I question Admiral Fallon about an article in the "Washington Post," titled, "Equipment for Added Troops is Lacking, New Iraq Forces Must Make Do, Officials Say." And Mr. Chairman, I'd like that article to become a part of the record of this hearing as well.

SENATOR CARL LEVIN (DEMOCRAT, MICHIGAN)

It, it will be part of the record.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

And after the hearing, the chairman and ranking member send a letter to Secretary Gates, asking about the readiness of our troops. In that article were very specific and disturbing quotes from Lieutenant General Speaks and others about the lack of equipment, the lack of readiness. And among the concerns were the proper level of armor for vehicles, pre-positioned sets issued in Kuwait are the add-on armor type, and do not provide adequate protection, insufficient add-on armor kits for logistic trucks and prime movers, insufficient and incomplete electronic countermeasure devices designed to defeat IEDs, insufficient force protection materials for the outpost we are building in Baghdad and throughout Anbar province, sufficient training sets of, insufficient training sets of equipment in vehicles at home station for units to train on in preparation for deployments.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

And - I'm very concerned that we, we are pursuing a policy that, regardless of what one thinks about it or how one evaluates its chances for success, certainly raises the fears that so many of our young men and women are going to be put into very dangerous situations in neighborhoods in Baghdad, dependent upon their Iraqi counterparts who may or may not be reliable. And, Mr. Chairman, I, I believe that because of these disturbing reports about equipment shortages, we should, as we begin the debate, the Warner-Levin proposal, include provisions that require that adequate equipment and training be mandated so that we do not send any young American into this dangerous mission without knowing that they are as well prepared, as ready and, and equipped as they deserve to be to try to fulfill this mission.

GENERAL GEORGE CASEY (CHIEF OF STAFF NOMINEE)

I don't think anyone feel stronger about that than I do, Senator.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK)

Thank you, General.

REMARKS AT THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE WINTER MEETING, 2/2/2007

CLINTON: Hello, Democrats.

(APPLAUSE)

Well, I'm Hillary Clinton, and I'm running for president.

(APPLAUSE)

I'm in, and I'm in to win, because we have to take our country back.

(APPLAUSE)

This campaign that we're going to wage is one of the most important that we've ever had in our country. We're going to need everybody working together and getting the results that we want: not only adding to our numbers in the Congress, but taking back the White House.

(APPLAUSE)

And I want to thank my longtime friend Governor Dean for helping to lead the charge for the victories we had in November of '06.

(APPLAUSE)

I want to thank all of these state chairs and the committee members, because this was a unified effort, and I know how hard everyone worked.

And that was the first step: to get the Congress back, to begin to try to rein in the president, to send a clear message that the Democrats are going to do all we can to hold the president accountable and to try to repair the damage and limit what else might come over the next two years.

CLINTON: Now, I know a lot of Democrats feel as though we just want this election be here. And we do, don't we?

(APPLAUSE)

But we're going to have to do all we can within the Congress to try to set a new course.

And it's challenging. You know that.

We have a Democratic majority in the House under the great leadership of Speaker Pelosi.

(APPLAUSE)

And we're making progress. And in the Senate, we have increased our numbers, but we still have to create coalitions in order to get the votes we need to make the changes that are so necessary.

This is what I pledge to you for the next two years: that I will work with my colleagues in the Senate to do everything we can to change the direction of this country.

And then, when I am president, working with a Democratic Congress, we will really take our country back and put it on the right track again.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, I am not here today just to start a campaign. I've been in a lot of campaigns over the years.

CLINTON: I'm here to start a conversation with our country. Because we've got to admit to ourselves that things are just not right.

We've lost something these last six years. All of you feel it. We know it. And we have to regain it.

It's the basic bargain that many of us grew up expecting: that we felt if you worked hard and did your part, your country would stand with you. It would give you the chance to build a better life for yourself and your family.

It was a bargain that created the American middle class, the greatest social invention in the history of the world.

You know, every country has a rich people, with all due respect. And unfortunately, we still have a lot of poor people everywhere.

But no country has created this extraordinary middle class out of which most us came, with the promise of education and better opportunities.

I grew up in a middle-class family in the middle of America. My dad was a World War II vet who came back. In order to make a better life for us, he ran a small business, printing fabrics for draperies. And lots of times, the only workers he had were my mother and my brothers and me.

But we were all in it together. And we felt, because of the example he and my mom set, that if you served your country, your country would serve you.

CLINTON: Now when I travel around...

(APPLAUSE)

... our country, that's not how people are feeling.

Corporate profits and CEO pay are hitting new highs, while wages for hardworking Americans are stagnant. Last year, more people went bankrupt than graduated from college.

And if you look at the increasing number of the uninsured, if you realize the shame of 26,000 victims of Katrina still living in trailers, if you ask the worried mom who's trying to figure out, "What does No Child Left Behind mean when I feel like my children are being left behind?"...

(APPLAUSE)

... when I travel across upstate New York and hardworking people come and say, "Senator, they're closing this factory down and shipping our jobs overseas. Why can't we get tough on China?"

And I say, "Because of the debt that this government under this president has exploded, we are now on dependent upon China. And how do you get tough on your banker?"

We need to start standing up for the American worker again and be able to once again compete and win in the global economy.

(APPLAUSE)

But it's not just manufacturing jobs, is it? You know, when I was in Iowa last weekend, I met...

(APPLAUSE)

I had a great time.

CLINTON: Thank you all very much.

(APPLAUSE)

I met a young man, an engineer, who was training his replacement. And he said, "You know, I did what I was supposed to do. I went to college. I got an advanced degree. I've worked hard. And now I'm training somebody who is going to make one-tenth of what I make."

We need a new economic strategy that will rebuild the American middle class and give hope to people who feel that they've done their part and they're waiting for their government to be on their side again.

(APPLAUSE)

So what I want to do is to renew that promise of America. It's the greatest promise that anyone could be born with or come to be part of. And I want to restore the greatness and respect for our country around the world.

Now, I know very well that we're going to be debating, starting this week, in the Senate, a resolution of disapproval of this president's ill-conceived plan to escalate our involvement in Iraq.

Now, there are many people -- there are many people who wish we could do more, but let me say that if we can get a large, bipartisan vote...

PROTESTER: (inaudible) war!

CLINTON: ... to disapprove this president's plan for escalation, that will be the first time that we will have said no to President Bush...

(APPLAUSE)

... and began to reverse his policies.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, I want to go further.

I proposed capping the troop levels. I want to make it very clear that we need to threaten the Iraqi government that we're going to take money away from their troops, not our troops, who still lack of body armor and armored vehicles -- but we're going to send a clear message that we are finished with their empty promises and with this president's blank check.

CLINTON: And let me add one other thing, and I want to be very clear about this.

If I had been president in October of 2002, I would not have started this war.

(APPLAUSE)

And if we in Congress -- if we in Congress, working as hard as we can to get the 60 votes you need to do anything in the Senate -- believe me, I understand the frustration and the outrage.

You have to have 60 votes to cap troops, to limit funding to do anything.

If we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president, I will.

(APPLAUSE)

And I expect to be busy in the White House in January 2009 because once and for all, we are going to provide quality, affordable, universal health care coverage to every single American.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, I know some people say, "What is Hillary Clinton doing talking about health care?"

(LAUGHTER)

Well, as Dr. Dean knows, this is one of my favorite subjects.

And I learned a lot about what we need to do to get it done. It's a big difference between calling for it, impassioned speeches about it, presenting legislation that embodies your hopes and dreams, and another thing to put together the political coalitions to actually make it happen.

(APPLAUSE)

The same is true with energy independence.

CLINTON: The Democrats know what needs to be done. Again, we're working to try to push this agenda forward.

The other day, the oil companies reported the highest profits in the history of the world. I want to take those profits, and I want to put them into a strategic energy fund that will begin to fund alternative smart energy, alternatives and technologies that will begin to actually move us toward the direction of independence.

(APPLAUSE)

I have to tell you, I am not running for the president to put Band-Aids on our problems. I am running to ensure that we actually address them and meet them and get results here in our country. Because we have to prove to ourselves as well as the rest of the world that we're still the most creative, most innovative, most effective nation in the history of the world.

We have not been demonstrating that recently, have we?

So we have all these big challenges. And we need smart, strong, leadership that can provide the solutions that everyone knows we have to have.

I believe that I can, with my lifetime of experience and qualifications, make it possible for us once again to believe in ourselves, because we can actually see results.

People are tired of politics as usual, with good reason. We're just marching in place. We may even be falling further and further behind.

If you look at every international indicator, we don't have the highest quality health care, although we pay more for it than anybody in the world. We're not setting high goals and moving toward them on energy independence and to combat global warming, although we emit more gas emissions than anybody else globally.

We can do this, but there's a strain of fatalism in some of the conversations that have crept into the political dialogue. You know, "If we try to deal with global climate change, we'll wreck the economy."

I reject that.

(APPLAUSE)

"If we try to have universal health care coverage, we'll bankrupt our country."

I reject that.

I've been fighting for more than 35 years on behalf of poor people and children and women and families.

CLINTON: I worked in Arkansas, with my friends from Arkansas, to reform our schools and to reform rural health care. I have worked across our state in New York to bring economic opportunities to our smallest villages and help our farmers, while dealing with the aftermath of 9/11 and what it meant for the greatest city in the world.

You and I know there is another kind of experience that we're going to need in 2008. I know a thing or two about winning campaigns.

(APPLAUSE)

And when our party and our candidates are attacked, we have got to stand up and fight back.

(APPLAUSE)

I have always done that, and I always will.

I know how they think, how they act and how to defeat them. And if you give me the chance, that's exactly what we will do together in 2008.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, ultimately, this is not about you, me or any of our other wonderful candidates. And we've got a great field of really strong and dedicated candidates.

This is about what we leave to the next generation. This is about our children and our grandchildren. And I believe we can marshal our faith, our strength and our ingenuity to restore that basic bargain, to renew the promise of America.

That's what I love about our country. You know, let's not listen to the naysayers. Let's plow ahead and shape our own future. We can make history and remake our country's future.

We can elect the first woman president.

(APPLAUSE)

We can fix health care.

(APPLAUSE)

We can stop global warming.

(APPLAUSE)

We can stop the genocide in Darfur.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: And, yes, we can find the right end to the war in Iraq.

(APPLAUSE)

Americans are looking for solutions. Democrats, we have them.

(APPLAUSE)

Americans are looking for change. Democrats, we are that change.

(APPLAUSE)

Americans are looking for unity. We can unify our country again.

(APPLAUSE)

America is looking for leaders who see what they see: Our world is changing. The threats we face are real. But the promise of America and the values that sustain us are just as real.

And if we're willing to stand up and fight for them, there is no stopping us.

Join me on this journey.

Thank you all, and God bless you.

(APPLAUSE)

SEN. CARL LEVIN HOLDS A HEARING ON THE FISCAL YEAR 2008 BUDGET FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE, 2/6/2007

CLINTON: Thank you very much for your service and your patience.

And I'm grateful to each and every one of you for the work you do.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we have a number of extremely important issues before the committee, that have been highlighted by various members. We have the budget, which is going to deserve and need a lot more scrutiny.

We've heard a lot of talk about the percentage of GDP it is in comparison to the percentage of GDP in other wars and conflicts.

I might also add, the taxation rates were considerably different during those conflicts as well.

We are not paying for the military that we want, nor are we paying adequately for the global war on terrorism.

So this budget is going to have to be scrutinized, but we're going to be faced with the dilemma of whether we are adequately funding our troops and whether we will pay for adequately funding our troops.

Secondly, we continue to have questions about how we ensure American troops are trained and equipped, something that I've raised in a series of our hearings, with General Petraeus, Admiral Fallon and others, General Casey most recently.

And I think you can hear, Secretary Gates, we're still not satisfied. Both you and General Pace have responded to questions, starting with the chairman's from the very beginning of this hearing, but there remains a considerable amount of anecdotal evidence about shortages.

And I will be reading the inspector general's report later this afternoon, but from the reports that we have received, it appears that there was a lack of cooperation, perhaps, with appropriate officials in DOD and the chain of command in trying to get to the bottom of whether or not we have adequate training and equipping of our troops.

So this will continue to be an issue that I and others will pursue.

We also have heard about the need to enlist the entire government to participate effectively in the war on terrorism. And as Senator Warner said -- I can remember when he was on the floor, introducing his bill and speaking about it -- we actually have made a stab at this. I think it's fair to say none of us are either fully aware of or satisfied with what direction it has taken us.

And I think Senator Session's suggestions are really serious ones that should be carefully considered by the administration.

CLINTON: We also...

WARNER: Senator, if you'd yield, I have here the reference to legislation and you co-sponsored that legislation...

CLINTON: Yes, I did.

WARNER: ... together with Senator Lugar and myself.

CLINTON: That's exactly right.

And we did, under Senator Warner's leadership, pass that legislation. But it's clear that none of us had a handle on what, if anything, has been done to implement it. So we really do wish to have some additional information and feedback on that.

We've also begun to examine -- and I appreciate very much Senator McCaskill's lead on this -- examine the way our government has outsourced so much of the work of preparing and defending our nation, to private contractors who may be neither cost-effective nor free of conflict.

I think this will be a very important issue for this Congress that we will be exploring and, again, looking for assistance from you.

And, finally, your words, Secretary Gates -- how we best incentivize the Iraqi government -- there are those who think that the era of carrots has got to end, that we've been, in effect, ignored by giving them a blank check and the blood and treasure of our nation, especially the lives of our young men and women and the injured that have come home with such grievous wounds. And we don't believe that's an effective way to get their attention.

This part of the world which you have studied. You were certainly part of the Iraq Study Group before being asked to be secretary of defense. You know very well that I'm not sure carrots are part of the diet. So I think that many of us have been searching for more effective ways that can get the attention, not only of the nominal Iraqi government, but of the sources that support it.

And to that end, in addition to our concerns about the attack on Karbala and what that meant -- and I appreciate General Pace referencing the likelihood that it was well-organized insurgents, which I translate to be Sunni elements -- we also are concerned about the Mahdi Army militia obtaining not only trained men who we have trained, but also equipment.

Recent article on February 2nd, McClatchy Newspapers, entitled, "Mahdi Army Gains Strength Through Unwitting Aid of U.S" -- the U.S. military drive to train and equip Iraq's security forces has unwittingly strengthened Sadr and his militia.

CLINTON: So these are deep concerns to us, and we don't believe that -- we, at least speaking for myself -- see much change in the testimony we hear, in the plans that are being implemented, as to how we're going to get a handle on these very serious challenges.

But, Mr. Secretary, I want to change direction just somewhat abruptly, because I want to ask you about a letter that, on January 16th, I -- and along with 21 of my colleagues, including several members of this committee -- sent to President Bush asking for an explanation of what plan B steps he was considering with respect to Darfur, including possible punitive military action such as a no-fly zone or a blockade of Port Sudan.

Obviously, we are facing -- once again -- the repeated and blatant violations of numerous cease-fires, peace agreements and U.N. obligations by the government of President Bashir.

It is worth noting, I think, that this does not need to be a no-fly zone on the scale of what we formerly ran over Iraq, but could be accomplished with a significantly smaller outlay of resources by directing punitive strikes against Sudanese planes known to have taken part in illegal bombing missions in Darfur.

I've made this suggestion on several occasions, to our NATO commander in the past and to others within the administration. And I'd like to ask you if you have been instructed by the president to begin planning or preparing any such measure, and whether or not you would look into that if you have not yet been asked to do so?

GATES: I have not been asked to. I would defer to General Pace in terms of whether the Joint Chiefs have done any contingency planning along those lines. And I'm certainly willing to pursue it.

CLINTON: General Pace?

PACE: I have not been asked to do that, ma'am.

CLINTON: Well, I think that, obviously -- from the perspective of many of us -- the ongoing genocide in Darfur and the blatant refusal by the Sudanese government to act has been deeply concerning.

We have about 7,000 African Union troops there. They are the sole line of defense for the hundreds of thousands of civilians facing genocide.

$20 million was included in the '07 defense appropriations bill to provide assistance to these troops. They are obviously woefully underfunded. They don't have logistics support. They have no airlift capacity.

I understand the State Department, which has been administering all U.S. funding going to the African Union troops, has requested that this new $20 million be transferred to them.

CLINTON: Is your office considering that request? And do you have an opinion, as the secretary of defense, whether that meets our desire, having put this into the Department of Defense appropriations rather than the State Department appropriations?

GATES: This is the first I've heard of it, Senator. I'll have to look into it.

CLINTON: Thank you.

And finally, Mr. Secretary, the FY '07 defense appropriation bill contains a provision I sponsored requiring the Department of Defense to submit a detailed report on the department's role in assisting the parties to implement the Darfur peace agreement of May 5th, 2006.

The report is envisioned to contain information on issues of critical importance to stabilizing Darfur, such as an assessment of assets that the U.S. military and NATO are able to offer the African Union mission in Sudan and any efforts made by the Department of Defense to leverage troop contributions from other countries to serve in the proposed hybrid A.U.-U.N. peacekeeping mission for Darfur.

This report was supposed to be available no later than January 15th, 2007. That was 90 days after enactment of the bill, as of October 17th, 2006. May I ask you, Mr. Secretary, if you know the status of this report?

GATES: No, ma'am, but I'll find out.

CLINTON: And I would appreciate it being prompted delivered to me and to this committee.

Thank you very much.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF STATE, COUNTY AND MUNICIPAL EM-PLOYEES 2008 DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES FORUM, 2/21/2007

SEN. CLINTON: Hello! (Cheers, applause.) Thank you. Thank you all. (Cheers, applause.) Thank you very much. (Cheers, applause.) Well -- thank you. (Cheers, applause.)

Let me -- (cheers, applause) -- let me thank AFSCME and Nevada for holding this first forum. I am delighted to be here both because today is the first day of my presidential campaign in this state, and I am looking forward -- (cheers, applause) -- to traveling around the state and getting to know more about the issues that affect the people here.

But it's also going to be important for us to have a united front as Democrats about what matters in the lives of Americans, and -- (applause) -- one of the things that I know that matters is that people like all of you, who are public servants who keep the work going that provides the child care, that provides the civic services, that is there on the front lines taking care of our elderly and our young and everybody in between, that you have a right to organize and bargain and have your voices heard in the debates about the issues. (Cheers, applause.)

Now, when I announced my candidacy, I said I'm in and I'm in to win, and I'm in to win to be the best president that we can have for the working families of America. From my -- (cheers, applause) -- from my work of a lifetime, I have been focused on how we provide health care and education and give people the services and support they need so that they can live the best lives that are possible.

I've stood with you on card check, and in the Senate I'm sponsoring it, and I will vote for it. (Applause.) I've stood with you against all of the Bush administration's efforts to roll back protections like overtime, and to interfere with working conditions. And I said that if we didn't raise the minimum wage, then members of Congress should not get a raise until it was done, and the Democratic Congress will do that! (Cheers, applause.)

I also stood with you against the privatization of Social Security and -- (cheers, applause) -- now I want to stand with you against the privatization of our government. Under this administration -- (cheers, applause). The Bush administration has been privatizing government services. In fact, now we have more government contractors and grantees by three times the number than the entire military and Civil Service personnel. We have to stop that. And I have proposed cutting government contractors by 500,000 as soon as I'm sworn in -- (cheers, applause) -- and saving $8 billion to $10 billion.

But what I want to do with all of you is to renew the promise of America, and as president, we will finally have universal health care coverage that will be provided to every single American. (Cheers, applause.)

We will have a new energy future that makes us more secure, cleans up our environment, and puts people to work.

We will have an education policy that says any youngster who really wants to go to college will be able to afford to do so. (Applause.)

So I'm looking forward to the campaign here and to the conversation. And now I get to join George and hear about the questions you have. (Laughter.)

MR. STEPHANOPOULOS: From Nevada. (Laughs.)

SEN. CLINTON: From Nevada. (Cheers, applause.)

MR. STEPHANOPOULOS: But let's begin with Iraq. It is the number one issue in this campaign. You heard Senator Dodd explain why he thought his vote was a mistake. Why wasn't your vote a mistake? And why are you against the proposals, particularly of Governor Vilsack, who says we have to bring the U.S. troops home right now by cutting off funding, and only fund a small strategic force in northern Iraq?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, George, my vote was a sincere vote based on the facts and assurances that I had at the time. And I have taken responsibility for my vote, and I believe that none of us should get a free pass. It is up to the voters to judge what each of us has said and done.

But I think the most important thing now is to focus on what we have to do together, particularly as Democrats, to try to force this president to change direction. (Applause.) And it will not be easy.

But as you know, I have introduced legislation to stop the escalation, to protect our troops, because it is a disgrace that the president is sending into harm's way young men and women who do not have all of the equipment -- the body armor and other equipment and training that they need. (Applause.)

My legislation would also say to the Iraqis: Enough. We are not going to fight your battles. We are not sending our young men and women in. You have to be on the front lines of your own defense.

And as far as I'm concerned -- people ask me, "Well, why don't you want to cut money for American troops?" I want to cut money for Iraqi troops. I want to cut the money that they get, because they're not standing up and fighting the way that they have said they would. (Cheers, applause.)

And I -- I have proposed that we have an international conference. I don't understand why the president takes this policy that he won't talk to bad people, you know. (Laughter.) I don't know what world he lives in, but most of us have to talk to people we don't agree with. (Laughter, applause.) And I would hope that he would convene an international conference.

And finally, I do want to start redeploying our troops out of Iraq, but I want to do it -- within 90 days, I want to begin the process. And if the president doesn't comply with the -- the requirements I've put forth, then I think we should require that he has to seek additional congressional authority, because it has run out on what George Bush has tried to do in Iraq. (Cheers, applause.)

MR. STEPHANOPOULOS: The next question comes from Nelda Hoover of Las Vegas. And she's basically asking you to elaborate on something you said in your opening statement -- health care.

SEN. CLINTON: Right.

MR. STEPHANOPOULOS: Many experts project that it would cost between $90 (billion) $120 billion to actually achieve universal health care for everyone in America. With the nation's deficit and the price tag of the Iraq war straining our budget, is comprehensive health care reform achievable in the near future? And if comprehensive reform is not possible, would you pursue incremental steps toward that goal, or do you view that approach as Band-Aid therapy for a hemorrhaging wound?

SEN. CLINTON: It's a great question. And you know, I have a little bit of experience in trying to reform health care. (Laughter.) And I still have the scars to show for it. I needed some health care after that was over.

But I believe the question is really an important one. We already spend more money than anybody else in the world, by about $800 billion, and we don't even insure everybody. We have 47 million uninsured. And then we have millions of the rest of us who, in effect, are underinsured, because when our doctor says we need a certain treatment, the insurance company says no, and you've got to argue to get what your doctor has said you need. (Scattered cheers, applause.)

And we're also at a competitive disadvantage because other countries either provide health care or don't, and our companies are trying to be competing in a global economy.

So I want to figure out how we provide universal health care without putting billions of -- more into the system when we already spend so much more than everybody else. Let's get the price down by negotiating with the drug companies to get the costs of prescription drugs down, for example. (Applause.)

And you know, I am going around the country, and I'm asking people's advice. We have health care workers in this audience. They see every day how money could be saved and how things could be done differently.

So I'm going to be proposing a specific plan, but I'm also going to continue to work to try to provide more coverage.

For example, the president's budget wants to cut the Children's Health Insurance Program, and I worked on that during the Clinton administration. I think we should be insuring more children, not cutting the children of hard-working families off of this Children's Health Insurance Program. (Cheers, applause.)

And I am absolutely convinced this time we're going to do it because the people that come to talk to me now they're CEOs of companies, they're doctors and nurses and hospital administrators. They know that if we don't change the system we have, it's going to continue hemorrhage money. We're going to have more uninsured people. We're going to have the fastest growing problem of people who are not going to get what they thought they paid for, and we're going to continue to lose jobs. They're going to be sent to other countries because we're not being able to provide health care at a decent cost.

So I'm very excited about what I'm going to do. You know, President Kennedy said in his inauguration that he wanted to have a man on the moon by the end of the decade. Well, I want to have universal health care coverage by the end of my second term, and with everybody working on that I think we can do it. (Cheers, applause.)

MR. STEPHANOPOULOS: (Inaudible.) This is very different from the studio.

Finally, some news from today. Your campaign has gotten in a bit of press release scuffle with the Obama campaign today, and it began with comments of David Geffen, who sponsored a fundraiser for Senator Obama, made in The New York Times today critical of you and President Clinton. Your campaign has put out a press release calling on Senator Obama to denounce those remarks.

Do you personally believe that Senator Obama should denounce David Geffen's remarks? And more generally, do you think that candidates, all the candidates should be held accountable for the statements of their supporters and donors?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I want to run a very positive campaign, and I sure don't want Democrats or the supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction. I think we should stay -- (cheers, applause) -- focused on what we're going to do for America. And you know, I believe Bill Clinton was a good president, and I'm very proud of the record of his two terms. (Cheers, applause.)

MR. STEPHANOPOULOS: Should he denounce them? Should Senator Obama denounce it?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I'm going to leave that up to the other campaign. I'm glad to be here in Carson City. I'm excited to be part of this -- (cheers) -- wonderful forum and to have a chance with the other candidates who came to talk to the people here about what we want to do and to try to earn your support.

You know, people are not going to agree with 100 percent of what I say or what anybody says, but we have a chance now that we have a Democratic majority, and I'm thrilled that your own senator, Senator Reid, is our leader in the Senate. And we are -- (cheers, applause) -- we're making progress, and the thing that is missing is a Democrat in the White House. (Cheers.) And that's what we have to do this next time. (Continued cheers, applause.)

Thank you.

MR. STEPHANOPOULOS: Thank you.

SEN. CLINTON: Thanks, everybody! (Continued cheers, applause.) Thank you.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON DELIVERS REMARKS AT A CAMPAIGN EVENT, 2/23/2007

(JOINED IN PROGRESS)

CLINTON: ... most countries.

And we could get valuable information, figure out how better to leverage influence, and send a message to those people who share our values who are trapped in societies where freedom and opportunity are scarce that there are better ways.

So these are some of the things that I would like to see done, and have written legislation to require them.

But this is a sophisticated audience, and you know we couldn't get the 60 votes we needed in the Senate last week to pass the resolution of disapproval.

And some people say, well, Senator, don't talk about the way the Senate works. Well, if you don't understand why we can't do what we want to do and what many of you want the new Democratic majority to do, then I don't think I'm doing my job to explain what the challenges are and how we can address them.

We need four more Republicans to join us. And so the pressure needs to be put on the Republicans. Democrats need to stay united against this president's policy and against the mistakes that George Bush has made repeatedly and recklessly since the beginning of his preemptive war in Iraq.

(APPLAUSE)

So there's going to be a big agenda for the next president. And I'm excited, because I believe that the country is ready to respond, to be called to action, to ask for sacrifice.

You know, as a senator from New York, I was stunned when all the president asked any of our citizens to do in the face of that attack was to go shopping.

(LAUGHTER)

Hardly the call to history-making change that we would have expected in the face of such an assault on our country.

But I know that Americans are waiting to be called. And when I'm president, I'm not going to just propose a universal health care plan and work with the Congress to pass it -- I'm going to ask Americans to take better care of themselves.

You know, we have to be a healthier nation. We have to emphasize wellness and prevention, and do what is necessary to try to keep health care costs up and people's productivity up.

CLINTON: When I'm president, we're going to have a policy for energy.

I'm going to propose a strategic energy fund that would be funded in large part by the oil companies, take away the subsidies that they get and have them contribute to alternative forms of energy.

(APPLAUSE)

But I'm also going to ask people to conserve more. We've got to do more, and California's been a great leader in this.

When I travel around the country and I encounter skepticism from people who say, "Well, can we really begin to withdraw from foreign oil; can we really deal with global climate change?," I say, "Well, look what California's doing."

California, for 30 years, has been a leader in conservation and efficiency. And I think California's doing pretty well.

So why can't the rest of the country begin to cut our energy usage the way that California has?

To keep electricity usage flat for 30 years, that's an amazing accomplishment. The rest of the country has gone up by 50 percent.

But I'm also going to ask people to turn their lights off, to think more intentionally about what they can do.

Now, maybe one person doing that doesn't add up to much, but think if 300 million of us did it.

You know, my late father was a child of the Depression. He used to turn off every light before he left any room.

And I now find myself going around -- you know how you say you'll never do the things that your parents did?

(LAUGHTER)

So I'm going around turning off all the lights before I leave a room.

I know that we can do better.

And when -- I set out a goal that we're going to make sure every young person can go to college, because right now our college-going rate hasn't increased. It's been at about 30 percent of college graduates for many years now. And a lot of young people are being priced out of college.

We're going to fix that.

But I'm also going to make sure that we have a better partnership between parents and families and students and teachers and schools because education has to be a village affair, if you will. People have to feel committed to the process of education.

And I'm going to ask students and family members to be more committed.

So there's a lot of work that I'm excited about doing. I've been having a great time traveling around the country, talking with groups like this -- some small settings and some basketball arena settings.

But in every place, whether I'm here or in New Hampshire or Iowa or South Carolina, Nevada, Florida, wherever I've been, the excitement and support is very gratifying.

CLINTON: And I know there are still some who might say, "Yes, but can we ever elect a woman president?" And my response to that is, we won't know until we try. And I am prepared to win this campaign.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, certainly it's not a hard sell in the home of Nancy Pelosi, Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer.

(LAUGHTER)

But I would venture to say that each of them, who bring different talents and extraordinary abilities to their public positions, are elected time and time again not because they're women, but because they're the best person for the job to represent San Francisco and California.

(APPLAUSE)

So although I'm very proud to be a woman, I'm not running as a woman candidate. I'm running because I think I'm the best person to hit the ground running in January 2009 on behalf of America at home and abroad.

Thank you all very, very much.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you all. Thank you all very much.

Now, I think we have a couple of young volunteers with microphones, if they're here. Are they here?

So if people will just raise their hands who have questions, these young people with microphones will ask you to come out to the aisle so that they can give you a chance to ask your question.

So we'll start right over here.

QUESTION: Thank you, Senator Clinton. Good job on ignoring the hecklers.

(LAUGHTER)

When we make you president, will you please make Bill secretary of state and Al...

(LAUGHTER)

... the head of EPA?

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: You're not the first person to ask me that.

(LAUGHTER)

I may be wrong about this. I really need to check it because, seriously, people were asking me all over the country. You know, he is the most popular person in the world right now...

(LAUGHTER)

And I'm very proud of that, because he's doing a great job, trying to bridge some of the gaps that have grown up between us and the rest of the world.

But I think, ever since President Kennedy and Attorney General Kennedy, there's been a law against that -- I think.

(LAUGHTER)

However, I will promise you this: As president, I will continue the tradition of using former presidents as often as I can...

(LAUGHTER)

... to solve problems around the world and deal with the issues that we have to address as a nation.

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: And I would like to ask you, Hillary, very specifically, how are you going to address the -- increase the rate of the college-going rate in this country?

CLINTON: Thank you for asking that, and thanks for College Track. It's a great, great program. And I have followed it with a lot of interest and admiration.

Well, let me give you what I see as the longer-term answer, and then the shorter-term fixes.

Longer-term, we have to start with pre-school programs, to better prepare children who are otherwise going to be left out of not only the education system but the economy.

And you know, I've been a children's advocate most of my adult life, going back to work I did when I was a law student, articles I wrote, my involvement with the Children's Defense Fund and other organizations.

And so I'm -- probably, you naturally would expect -- an advocate for pre-school -- you know, high-quality child care, Head Start-like programs.

We have so much evidence that it really can make a difference in improving young children's receptivity to learning, their vocabulary and all the rest.

But I'm also an advocate of that because it makes economic sense. You know, the Federal Reserve Board of Minneapolis just published a study.

CLINTON: They asked themselves this question: What one thing -- one investment -- could we make that would most likely improve the quality of the American workforce for a more competitive global economy?

And people thought maybe they'd come back and say we need better transportation to get workers into the cities, or whatever they might have suggested.

They came back and said preschool. They said it had more of a payoff than anything else.

But that's a long-term solution. And then, obviously, the entire educational process has to be more responsive to an individual student's learning needs, because we don't have cookie-cutter children and we shouldn't have educational policies that treat them all as though they're little widgets that, you know, can be moved around from desk to desk and class to class.

(APPLAUSE)

So I want to help to re-imagine and redesign how we do education, and get it out of what is still a kind of industrial plant model -- you know, certain hours; difficult for working parents to be involved. We've got to get parents to be more supportive of education and the like.

But in the short term, we need to do several things. We need to increase the amount of the Pell Grant and make it year-round. That is the best way for low-income students to get additional help.

(APPLAUSE)

Number two, we've got to recognize that we have a lot of nontraditional students. The number of people who are going to college now that are not straight out of high school, but in their 20s, 30s, 40s, has increased. I think it's like 35 percent or 36 percent of the whole student population are these, quote, "nontraditional students."

A lot of them have other responsibilities. They have jobs. They have children. Oftentimes, they have very sporadic transportation.

They don't stay in school a lot of the time not because they're not doing well in school and they don't have the money for tuition and books -- the rest of their life falls apart. They can't keep going because they don't have the support services.

Way back in Arkansas, I started a program for a single-parent scholarship fund, not to help nontraditional students deal with their educational expenses, but everything else that they need to keep going in order to finish their education.

CLINTON: As you know, they're on the brink of getting their nursing degree, their child gets sick, they don't have any health insurance, they've got to go back to full-time work. Things like that.

So we've got to recognize that we're still thinking of students who are 18, 19 years old. That's no longer enough. We've got to be more open-minded.

Thirdly, we need more need-based scholarship aid.

(APPLAUSE)

It used to be we had merit-based for a very, you know, few but significantly high-achieving students, and then we had a lot of need-based aid.

Well, in the last several years we have moved dramatically toward a merit-based system. And so that means somebody like my daughter could qualify for aid when she doesn't need it. And some young person who is working as hard as can, maybe had to work to go through high school with a B or a C average, but is motivated, could get shut out.

So I just want to get back to where we have more need-based scholarship aid.

(APPLAUSE)

And I hope finally that we'll get the cost of loans down. It's been really outrageous how high tuition has gone, much faster than the rate of inflation.

And then the loan rates, the interest rates, have also gone up. I have legislation called the borrower's bill of interest because I'm tired of youngsters and their families basically being subjected to bait and switch. They sign on to one interest rate, then a few months or years later it gets increased, their debt load goes up, they can't necessarily make the payments.

So we just need to get a lot of transparency and cut the costs there, because ultimately it is in America's interest to send more young people to college.

So these are some of the ideas I have, but I'm open to a lot of other ones. My ultimate goal is just to make sure the doors to college are not shut on anyone who is motivated and ready to learn and get their degree, help themselves and help our country.

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: For the last 25 years, I've been a supporter of owner- occupied and renter-occupied affordable housing.

QUESTION: And as you probably know, northern California -- and California in general -- really has a crying need for more affordable housing.

I'm wondering what your attitude is toward it and what you think the federal government, should you be president, can do to aid that situation.

Thank you.

CLINTON: Well, thank you for the work that you've done because it's one of the biggest problems across our country.

And it's most acute in places like San Francisco or New York, where affordable housing is disappearing fast, both owner- and rental- occupied housing.

So I very much want to find some new ways of providing more affordable housing.

What I'm trying to do right now, while we still have two more years of the Bush administration, and with the budget that they've submitted, which was really disastrous for most of the programs that we care about: Cutting children's health insurance programs, cutting affordable housing programs, cutting all kinds of programs.

We have to hold the line on the public programs we have: Section 8 housing, Hope 6 housing. Because if they were to be decreased significantly, as the Bush administration wants, then your problem of trying to get affordable housing would be even greater than it already is.

So you have to hold the line on a lot of these public programs until we figure out a better way of doing it.

But I believe there's got to be a new federal housing program that does several things: comes up with new ways to incentivize the construction of both owner-occupied and renter-occupied housing.

And I would look to the private sector to help us with this. I mean, there's got to be -- maybe not the highest rates of return, but steady return for partnering with governments at local and state levels to come up with plans that build and provide that kind of housing.

I also think we've got to do more on the financial literacy side. I've done some work in New York where I've gotten, actually, legislation you may be aware of, where employers would get some tax help if they would help provide money for the downpayment or money toward the first couple of months of mortgage -- something that would give the employee a fighting chance to be able to afford to go into his own home.

But obviously, if the potential home buyer is not financially literate, a lot of bad things can happen because we now see some of these no-money-down mortgages and some of the other devices that have been used that are coming back to haunt people.

CLINTON: So we need to be really focused through employers, particularly, about how we can help lower income families understand that many of them are paying rents that you could, with proper management, turn into a mortgage.

How do we help them do that? How do we give the employers some opportunities and incentives to do it?

So I would be really open to any ideas you have. I know it's a problem, and I want to address it because people are now being pushed further and further away from their workplaces, so it's in the interest of hospitals and other large employers to have some affordable housing within easy communicating distance.

Thank you for your work.

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: I'm asking you a process question: We've had multiple national elections now -- 2000, 2002, 2004 and even 2006 -- in which there have been gross irregularities in terms of disenfranchisement, intimidation of voters, fraud with voting machines and stuff.

What is your campaign doing that's going to protect the election in 2008 and also to have mechanisms for enforcement of improper activities that don't depend on Alberto Gonzales?

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Well, I think that's about the most important process question I could be asked, because it's been maddening, hasn't it, to see what's happened in our elections in the last six years, particularly.

I have legislation, which is called the Count Every Vote Act, which tries to deal with every one of the efforts to defraud voters, to disenfranchise voters, inequitable allocation of resources -- you know, one precinct gets 10 machines, the precinct that is a minority population next door gets two machines and the college campus down the way gets one machine.

CLINTON: I mean, there are so many games that have been played by local officials, in addition to all the problems we've had with the voting machines.

And to really tackle this, we need comprehensive legislation. And I'm delighted that Senator Feinstein is now chairing the Rules Committee, under which election reform and these process questions falls.

And we couldn't get a fair hearing from the Republicans. I voted against the HAVA Act because I never thought the Bush administration would fund it or enforce it fairly.

So Senator Feinstein is going to be coming forth with new legislation. My staff and hers are working closely together.

So, on the legislative side, I think we'll get some better framework than the one we have now.

Let's get rid of, for example, the conflict of interest between the people who sell you the machines and the people who support certain candidates.

(APPLAUSE)

That's for starters.

(APPLAUSE)

But when it comes to my campaign, we will certainly run a very vigorous voter protection effort. Because I think it's just inexcusable that we would have any doubts or concerns about the integrity of our elections.

But I know that there may be still some residual desire, on the part of some, to mislead voters.

We saw evidence of that in '06, where, despite all the publicity, we had efforts to jam phones so that people couldn't get information. We had efforts to harass people with phones, pretending they were from another candidate.

We had information given to voters, particularly elderly voters, voters of color, that they were to vote on a different day than the day that the actual election was held. We have a lot of evidence of that.

So we're going to be extremely vigilant and run a ground campaign, with a lot of local officials and a lot of lawyers to try to prevent any of that kind of interference.

But we're going to need citizens to be particularly vigilant. And let me just put in a pitch for people to work at the polls.

SEN. CARL LEVIN HOLDS A HEARING ON GLOBAL THREATS TO U.S. SECURITY, 2/27/2007

COMMITTEE: SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman?

(LAUGHTER)

LEVIN: I'm sorry.

CLINTON: It's all right.

LEVIN: Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate that.

Admiral McConnell, the annual threat estimate characterizes Iran as determined to obtain nuclear weapons. In response to the series of questions from my colleague, Senator Graham, you obviously agree with that assessment.

I want to ask it a little bit differently: What is the best estimate of the U.S. intelligence community for how long it would take for Iran to develop nuclear weapons and the capacity to deliver them? And what degree of confidence do you have in that estimate?

MCCONNELL: The earliest they could produce a nuclear weapon would be early next decade, more likely, mid- next decade.

CLINTON: And by mid- next decade, are we talking 2015?

MCCONNELL: We would be talking 2015.

CLINTON: And when that date is reached, 2015, which is the earliest that they could produce a nuclear weapon, would they then have the capacity to deliver that nuclear weapon?

MCCONNELL: It depends on how they develop their program. If they were to start the program for delivery consistent with the development of a nuclear weapon, they could match and marry up in the same time frame. Normally it would take a little longer to have a delivery capability.

CLINTON: Thank you, Admiral McConnell.

General Maples, in 2005, Admiral Jacoby told me in testimony before this committee that North Korea had the ability to arm a missile with a nuclear device.

CLINTON: I think it was the first time that that testimony had ever been given in public.

And last year, General Maples, you told me that North Korea is, and I quote, "in the process of developing an intercontinental ballistic missile capable of delivering a nuclear warhead, but they have not done so yet, nor have they tested it."

Given the July 2006 missile tests, would you revise your assessment of whether North Korea has developed an intercontinental ballistic missile capable of delivering a nuclear warhead to the United States? If not, how many more years before North Korea has this capability?

MAPLES: I believe they have the technical capability, as we saw by the Taepo Dong, but they have not successfully tested it yet.

CLINTON: I just want to be clear that when we're talking about the technical capability, we're talking about a missile launched from North Korea that could reach California.

MAPLES: That's correct.

CLINTON: And with your assessment, do you have any best estimate as to how many more years before they would have a deliverable capability?

MAPLES: I would probably estimate it's not a matter of years; that in fact they will have learned from the Taepo Dong launch of this last summer and gone back to try to make corrections to whatever the failure was and apply that to the missile systems that they already have.

CLINTON: I'd like to ask Dr. Fingar, because I understand you have an expertise in China -- and also General Maples -- in your written statement that was submitted to the committee regarding China's military modernization, you state that you assess China's aspirations for great power status, threat perceptions and security strategy would drive China's modernization efforts even if the Taiwan problem were resolved. Is that correct?

FINGAR: That's correct.

CLINTON: Your written statement, however, fails to mention China's January 11th anti-satellite test. So perhaps this goes more to General Maples, but obviously I'd be pleased to hear from anyone on the panel.

CLINTON: Given China's recent anti-satellite test, and the Chinese government's professed opposition to the weaponization of space, what explains, in the opinion of any of you, the government's decision to permit the military to conduct such a test?

Do you believe that the leadership, either civilian or military, was aware of the potential negative implications in terms of U.S. diplomatic and potential military response, or was there some other motive at work?

I don't -- General Maples?

Dr. Fingar?

MAPLES: I just thought that, you know, I believe that the Chinese and the Russians to some extent will continue to pursue space and counter-space capabilities, as they demonstrated by the launch of the SE19.

CLINTON: And do you see that as fitting into your assessment that they're going to continue to modernize, regardless of any other factor that is going on, including the status of Taiwan?

MAPLES: They will continue to modernize, yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: Well, then, let me ask each of you to briefly respond -- in your opinion, under what circumstances would China become a military threat to the United States?

MCCONNELL: China today could be a military threat. They have intercontinental ballistic missiles, nuclear warheads and so on. So it's a matter of their building their military, in my view, to reach some state of parity with the United States.

So in a threat sense, it becomes intentions. So they're a threat today; they will become an increasing threat over time.

CLINTON: Dr. Fingar?

FINGAR: Well, they've certainly had the capability for decades. But they have appeared to have decided that we are not an enemy; that they require a peaceful international environment in order to proceed with their own efforts for economic modernization, in order to address their very severe social problems.

But they are a country with a history of, in their view, having been victimized by stronger external powers. And they take national defense, including lessons learned out of Desert Shield and Desert Storm -- forward defense -- to heart.

CLINTON: I appreciate your commenting. And perhaps this is an issue that we can explore further, because, obviously, both within their government, as well as within ours, there is a debate occurring as to how to view each other. And I personally think it's one of the most important debates for us to get right.

And finally, Dr. Fingar, in response to a series of questions about the NIE on Iraq, do you have an opinion about the impact on Iraq's potential for stability and security of a phased redeployment versus a rapid withdrawal?

FINGAR: Senator, I do not. It's not a question that I have looked at or that we have looked at.

CLINTON: I think that's important.

And I appreciate your candor on that issues. Because, clearly, the conclusion some are drawing from the NIE would suggest that there was an opinion and that you had such an opinion. And I appreciate your response to my question.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I think it would be useful to have the committee staff look into the chronology of the activities surrounding our statement back in 2002 about North Korea's highly enriched uranium program.

My recollection was that we stopped sending fuel oil before North Korea pulled out of the NPT and dismissed the IAEA inspectors.

But I think this is very important, because we've learned some lessons. I think we've learned some lessons about what not to do in dealing with serious threats such as that posed by a nation like North Korea and others obtaining nuclear weapons.

But if we could get that chronology.

LEVIN: The committee staff will do that.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

LEVIN: And, by the way, my recollection is the same as yours: that we did stop sending the heavy fuel oil to North Korea before they withdrew from the framework and left the IAEA. But we will have the staff double-check that.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Vice President Cheney was in Pakistan yesterday. And from the news reports, it appears that he delivered what is referred to as a stiff message -- stiff private message to the Pakistani government to crack down more effectively on the Taliban and Al Qaida inside Pakistan.

I assume, Admiral McConnell, that Vice President Cheney was briefed in an up-to-date way about whatever intelligence assessments were attributed to our understanding of Pakistan before he went. Is that correct?

MCCONNELL: That is correct. And, in fact, he was accompanied by the deputy director of CIA to ensure he had all the current information.

CLINTON: So I just want to ask you therefore, based on that and based on Vice President Cheney's apparent mission there, is it the assessment of our intelligence community, number one, that Pakistan is capable of doing more with respect to Taliban and Al Qaida than they have currently have done; and, number two, that President Musharraf's hold on power within Pakistan is firm enough for him to take such additional steps?

MCCONNELL: One, we believe they could do more.

And the issue of being elected for the next term is the issue that, in my view, that the president of Pakistan is wrestling with.

He signed the agreement with the tribal leaders in the frontier area, as you're aware, last fall. And the question was, he was taking casualties for going into those areas attempting to chase Al Qaida. He believed -- he, the president of Pakistan, believed that he could be more effective by signing this peace agreement.

MCCONNELL: And from our point of view, capabilities of Al Qaida for training and so on increased. Therefore, the vice president's visit and others visit to make the case that we have to be more aggressive in going after Al Qaida in Pakistan.

The balancing act, of course, is the president's standing in that country with an election coming up this fall.

CLINTON: Thank you.

LEVIN: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

We'll now adjourn to S-407. We're not sure how long that will last. It should be fairly brief, but we will go immediately, those of us who are able to go to S-407.

Thank you all very much for your testimony. And this part will stand adjourned.

"Power Lunch," CNBC, 3/1/2007

MR. GRIFFETH: And welcome you back to "Power Lunch." I'm Bill Griffeth, along with Sue Herera.

I suspect when the secretary gets back to his office at the Treasury Department, he will have this letter sitting on his desk waiting for him. It is a letter from Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, expressing concern about the level of foreign ownership of U.S. debt. She also sent this letter to Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke.

And we're pleased to welcome Senator Clinton, joining us today from Capitol Hill. Senator, good to see you. Thank you for joining us.

SEN. CLINTON: Oh, it's my pleasure.

MR. GRIFFETH: What specifically is your concern about that? What are you expressing to the chairman and the secretary here?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think what has happened over the last 48 to 72 hours should be a real wake-up call for our country. Obviously the level of our public debt that is now held by central banks and foreign governments is a problem. And I don't want the administration to ignore this wake-up call and just hit the snooze button again. We've got to get serious about our own fiscal house, because as you just heard from Secretary Paulson, a lot of the issues we need to deal with, such as protecting intellectual property, pushing for good contractual and judicial systems in countries with whom we do business, are made all the more difficult if we are dependent upon foreign governments, such as China, to continue buying our debt. It is hard to negotiate from a position of strength with your banker.

And so I would hope that the fiscal situation we find ourselves in, the very large trade deficit that continues to increase, will give the administration some impetus to start addressing it seriously.

MR. GRIFFETH: So your fear is what? That they would -- could choose to sell their holdings and what the implications would be for that? Is that what you're worried about?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I'm worried about several things. All of the issues that we know we have to address in order to have a robust but fair global marketplace depend upon other countries frankly changing some of their ways of doing business. I think Secretary Paulson just talked about that. You know, we need to protect our intellectual property. We need other countries to do the same in order for us to feel comfortable trading with them. We need to try to prevent piracy, which takes billions of dollars out of the pockets of, you know, American businesses. And there's a host of other issues that we should have a more concerted effort addressing.

But it is more difficult that -- in order for us to do that if we are so dependent upon foreign governments waking up every morning and buying our debt. We're now at $2.2 trillion of our publicly held debt, about 44 percent, in the hands of China, Japan, the OPEC countries. I think we are losing our leverage to make the sorts of changes, from intellectual property protection to currency evaluation, that we need to do.

MR. GRIFFETH: Okay. And in fact, as you may know, Chairman Bernanke was testifying before a House Budget Committee hearing yesterday, and he was asked about this very issue repeatedly. Here is what he said about that.

BEN BERNANKE (chairman of the Federal Reserve): (From videotape.) It's not in the interest of China or Japan to dump treasuries on the market. They themselves would suffer capital losses from doing that. The market would adjust. It is a liquid market. And the holdings of, say, China of U.S. debt securities, including both public and non-public, is only about 5 percent of the total credit market outstanding.

MR. GRIFFETH: Is it possible your concerns underestimate the size and resilience of the U.S. debt market?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I'm very sure that we have a resilient market. My point is, why do we want to risk it? Why do we want to get to a situation where we even have to worry about this?

And when rumors of a capital gains tax in China can send the Shanghai market plummeting and then cause a ripple effect across the globe, we're in a different environment.

And I hear the administration and many others speaking about how liquid the capital markets are and how, you know, much investment credit there is around and how we shouldn't really worry about this. I think it's fair to say: Wait a minute. Let's at least factor it in.

There are many others, including myself, who are trying to raise, if not a red flag, a yellow one and asking what we can do to better prevent and frankly protect against decisions over which we are increasingly losing control.

MR. GRIFFETH: As you can imagine, we talk about this a lot here on a business channel, on CNBC. And most often the economists, when we talk about this issue of the level of foreign ownership of U.S. debt, they will point to the benefits to the U.S. economy. In other words, as the -- you know, it is the level of foreign ownership of U.S. debt in the last decade or so that have kept interest rates as low as they have been, which has been a benefit to the U.S. economy, to those consumers who need to borrow to either buy a house or to start a business, and so on. So are we ignoring the benefits of what we're talking about here?

SEN. CLINTON: I'm asking that we look at the entire picture. You know, corporate profits are up. CEO pay is up. Productivity of the American workforce is up. But the average American is only now barely beginning to realize some of those benefits, because wages and income have been largely stagnant.

We are seeing a continuing hollowing-out of our manufacturing base. I for one think that is a long-term problem for our country. We are losing even white-collar jobs and highly educated jobs, you know.

So yes, we are, you know, in effect buying a lot of products and depending upon the foreign governments who are helping to export those products to our market not to change policy. I think that is a slow erosion of our own economic sovereignty. I think we need to give some serious thought as to how we can better position ourselves, given the realities of an interdependent global market.

But I'm in favor of doing all that I can to make sure that the standard of living and the quality of life of Americans does not suffer over the long term. And I think we need to factor that in, and that's what I've asked that, you know, the secretary and the chairman at least give some serious thought to.

MR. GRIFFETH: Well, let me ask you. Let's cut to the chase on this. Would you propose limiting the level of foreign debt held by -- of U.S. debt held by foreign entities?

SEN. CLINTON: Not at this time, but I certainly would propose that our country get back to more fiscal responsibility, so that we were not pumping out as much debt and having such a high need for us to go into the global capital markets.

You know, it was only what, six years ago that we had a balanced budget and a surplus. And I remember at that time some commentators saying: Well, you know, we really have so much surplus now that we have to worry about reducing the debt too much.

Well, you know, we go in this country from sort of one swing of the pendulum to the other. I'd like us to try to just be sensible and reasonable about the balance we should strike. I want us to be globally competitive. I want us to be competing in the global markets. But I also want the countries with whom we do business to have protections for our intellectual property. I want them to have a rule of law that is enforceable. I want them not to manipulate their currency. And I don't want our country to be so dependent upon fiscal and other economic decisions that are made in foreign capitals.

MR. GRIFFETH: Even though --

SEN. CLINTON: That's up to us. It's not up to someone else to do what is in our best interest. It is up to us to put our own fiscal house in order.

MR. GRIFFETH: Well, even though, as Chairman Bernanke has said repeatedly when asked about this, that -- let's face it -- when foreigners buy our debt, that is a vote of confidence in the stability and the strength of the U.S. economy and the government.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, it's also because we're putting out so much debt. I mean, yeah, exactly, there is a market because we are going increasingly further into debt. And therefore we are not paying attention to the challenges we should meet. Because we're not investing in new energy technologies at the level of an Apollo project, with a national framework, other countries are going to be first to the starting blocks with that technology. Because we're not dealing with our health care costs, other countries are going to continue to have a competitive advantage over us. And we're not dealing with global climate change, and the list goes on.

So I think that there are costs to every decision. There are upsides and downsides. I just want us to be, in my view, more realistic at looking at some of the downsides.

We are not reinvesting in our own economy. We are driving up a debt. We are not paying for a war that the president continues to escalate. And we are then going into the global capital markets. And yes, we are an attractive market to everyone. Let's also be an attractive place of investment on behalf of America's long-term interests as well.

MR. GRIFFETH: Senator Clinton, thank you for joining us today. Appreciate it.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you. Good to talk to you.

MR. GRIFFETH: Hillary Clinton there, senator from New York, in Washington.

SEN. CARL LEVIN HOLDS A HEARING ON AFGHANISTAN, 3/1/2007

COMMITTEE: SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

CLINTON: I really appreciate Senator Webb's line of questioning because it really illustrates the continuing difficulty we have at sorting out what it is that's happening on the ground.

And what I'm concerned about is whether we are losing time to be able to get that figured out. I think we are really at a tipping point in Afghanistan. I felt that when I was there last month.

And I hope that the administration's commitment to new troops, the effort to get NATO more focused, the hope that we can strengthen the Karzai government all has to happen simultaneously in order to take on these challenges, whether it be a new offensive this spring or the growing strength of the druglords.

I wanted to switch gears for a minute though, because there are many things that have been spoken about that are very clearly difficult to America to influence.

CLINTON: But I want to talk about force protection for our forces and their quality of life because we are putting more in, number one. And number two, I think we all believe the violence will increase.

Whether we will see an explosion of violence that brings other elements of the Afghan society into it as we saw after the bombing of the mosque in Samarra, I don't know. But, clearly, with the uptick in suicide bombers and some of the other activities that we are seeing, there is going to be a big push to escalate the violence.

Now, earlier this month, the 82nd Airborne Division assumed responsibility for combat -- the combat mission from the 10th Mountain Division, which is based at Fort Drum in upstate New York. And as subordinate units from the 82nd moved into position, 10th Mountain Division, 3rd Brigade Combat Teams were displaced to Jalalabad.

And what we're getting in reports back to Fort Drum -- in fact, a February 26th Fort Drum news release highlights the issue I want to discuss with you. There's a sergeant first class who's quoted by saying, "The amount of people on the FOB and the amount of billeting didn't coincide." In other words, soldiers were living in a variety of very difficult and challenging living conditions.

My concern is that with a build-up and offensive capability coming from Pakistan and other areas within Afghanistan whether we're also leaving our troops more exposed than they need to be, particularly in these forward-operating bases.

It is disconcerting to extend a brigade by four months, which is what we did with the 10th Mountain Division, and make further demands if we don't have some adequate planning and execution for their logistical needs.

We are getting reports that we don't have enough bunkers, force protection barriers, checkpoint security systems, artillery radar systems, UAVs and other critical equipment for expanding the mission as I think the majority, certainly speaking for myself, agree we must do.

The deficiencies in the GAO report highlighted equipment shortages in the CENTCOM areas of operations. I've referred to that earlier in hearings focused on Iraq, because that was a constant source of complaint on my recent trip in my discussions with a lot of the soldiers and Marines who have returned from their deployments.

So I think that it would be incumbent upon you, General, and others to make sure we don't have shortages in resources as we are adding more American troops, and that we have the services and logistics for the arriving troops.

And, again, I see this as an issue of force protection primarily.

What I wanted to ask about is an article in today's New York Times that NATO and American forces knew there was a suicide bomber in the Bagram area before the suicide bomb attack that killed 23 at the main gate.

CLINTON: You know, probably all of us have been at Bagram. We know the security checkpoints one goes through.

We know, obviously, that the vice president was there and that the timing of the suicide attack, some have said, at least contributed to the sell-off in the stock market. Whether it did that or not, it was a serious and concerning incident.

Apparently, according to this article, the Afghan police chief in the area said he had not been informed of the possible threat.

Now, I'd like to ask the general first and then the ambassador: Is there a reason why the Afghan police forces would not have been notified?

And what mechanisms exist for coordinating with Afghan forces when intelligence threats are received?

How would you analyze what happened or what went wrong here?

LUTE: Well, Senator, I'm aware of the same reports today that you refer to.

It is not usual that specific threats would not be coordinated with all elements that could address them to include the Afghan police.

I do know that there are force protection mechanisms in place around Bagram, and every place else that we have Americans stationed, that feature close coordination with local officials.

So this caught me a bit short as well. And I really can't explain it today, until I have some time to look into it.

The other point, though, I'd make is that -- without crossing into the classified realm -- is that, with the suicide bomber roughly every third day, last year, in Afghanistan -- so over a hundred suicide bombers last year -- most of them acted without any specific indications in terms of time and place.

So while there may well have been a report, it was probably not specific in terms of time and location. And, of course, that doesn't lead us very far, in terms of what we might do by way of prevention.

CLINTON: I think it would be useful, General, to perhaps submit some additional information to the committee, after you've conducted further inquiry.

LUTE: Fair enough. We'll do so.

CLINTON: And, Ambassador, do you have anything to add?

EDELMAN: No, I don't, really, Senator Clinton. I saw the same story in the Times today, but like General Lute, I didn't have any awareness that there had been a specific intelligence report. So we'll check into it and get back to you.

CLINTON: Let me also ask that, with the changes in command that have occurred recently, with General McNeill, the overall senior NATO commander, with our ambassador in Afghanistan scheduled to leave, with our ambassador in Pakistan leaving, I think we're really going to regret the disruption of all these relationships.

I've suggested to the White House that they at least try to get some permanent presence with a high-level presidential envoy to move back and forth between Afghanistan and Pakistan.

There's so much disagreement and misunderstanding, as well as different perspectives about what should be in the interest of both of these leaders and their countries.

But I'm just worried that what we're seeing is an unraveling situation that will accelerate because there are no -- there's nobody there who has any ongoing relationship base.

And I'm also concerned about the command changes and adjustments about lines of authority in Afghanistan. And again, General, maybe you could get back to us on this. Who authorizes targets to be bombed? Who gets priority for medevac assets? Who gets priority for artillery support or receives logistics, in what priority?

What rules of engagement are now actually in effect? We've had these problems with NATO countries sending in troops but having different rules of engagement. Where does that stand now?

And who sorts out all of the potential disagreements among the various groups?

LUTE: Senator, the 32,000 troops, to include 15,000 Americans that are part of the NATO structure -- so ISAF -- are under one set of rules of engagement. They're approved by the North Atlantic Council.

General Jones is the resident expert in this room, in terms of the specifics, but all those troops operate under the same rules.

What distinguishes some national contributions inside that structure from others is that some are assigned missions that don't take them into the combat realm.

So there are some forces inside that 32,000 NATO force structure that conduct PRT, provincial reconstruction team, missions and not combat operations.

LUTE: But they, nonetheless, operate under the same ROE.

As for the list of different forms of support -- casualty evacuation and close air support, logistics and so forth -- those are all today coordinated by a four-star NATO commander who happens, today, to be a U.S. commander, General Dan McNeill, out of Kabul.

CLINTON: Just one follow-up: Are they the same rules of engagement that we had in Iraq prior to this latest escalation?

LUTE: They're not precisely the same, but they're very close.

CLINTON: There were many complaints about the rules of engagement, at least for our forces in Iraq. And they then changed because of the escalation, but I'd like to know what the differences are.

LUTE: The key difference in Baghdad, I think, is the place in particular that you're citing, was that before this recent change in azimuth in Iraq, there were political constraints on locations inside Baghdad and some political party affiliations inside Baghdad which prohibited, or at least inhibited, our operations against them. Those have been removed and we don't suffer than same problem in Afghanistan.

CLINTON: Thank you.

EDELMAN: Senator Clinton, if I might also address some of the understandable concerns I think you raised about continuity with some of the changes, I think there are some mitigating factors.

One is that General McNeill is, of course, going back for a second tour in Afghanistan. So although he is new to his current job and responsibilities, he does have familiarity with the key players like President Karzai and others.

And I think General Freakley is there for some period of time, the U.S. dual-hatted deputy. So there are some, I think, mitigating circumstances.

AT THE NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES 2007 CONGRESSIONAL CITY CONFERENCE, 3/13/2007

(JOINED IN PROGRESS)

CLINTON: ... more than 30,000 children cut from Head Start, vocational training, low-income heating assistance, child care and proposals to cut back on the Children's Health Insurance Program. So these cuts are going to force you to have to make some hard choices.

Do you try to continue to pay for the programs for kids or the programs for seniors?

That's a difficult choice. Are you going to try to continue to do something for affordable housing or homeland security?

Running your cities becomes a zero-sum game. Every day you're robbing Peter to pay Paul, and too many of our families are paying the price.

I think we should restore the fundamental principle that I grew up with and that I think most of us have tried to live by: You don't spend what you don't have on what you don't need. We need to replace the economic policy...

(APPLAUSE)

We need to replace the economic policy of borrow and squander with the tried and true policy of save and invest.

And what kind of investments should we be making? Well, I think you and I have some of the very same priorities.

First, let's invest in broadband deployment to insure that all of our cities and every community within those cities have the tools they need to compete and win in the global economy.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, back in 2000, America was number one in the world in broadband access. Today we're number 12.

And I believe strongly in markets, but when the market isn't working because, as my companies tell me in New York, it doesn't make economic sense to go up to the Adirondacks or to go to rural New York and try to, you know, either provide fiber or wireless service; there's just not as many customers as they need. And they tell me the same for certain inner-city areas in New York City and some of our other cities: There aren't enough paying customers in their opinion.

Well, the problem is that we can't just let this be left to the marketplace. We did not leave electricity to the marketplace. We did not leave the interstate highway system to the marketplace.

When there are needs that we want to address because it will link our country together and link it to the world, we need to step in. And I think it is time for the federal government to step in with planning grants and broadband infrastructure, equipment grants, and cash incentives.

I've sponsored legislation to do exactly that.

(APPLAUSE)

And we also should make it absolutely clear that decisions about telecommunications laws should not just be made in a conference room in Washington. They should be made in consultation with all of you.

(APPLAUSE)

These laws will affect the quality of life and the standard of living in your cities. You need a seat at the drafting table. And I will continue to fight against the idea that somehow we should preempt you from taking action to have broadband deployment in your cities, because you know what is best for your constituents.

(APPLAUSE)

Second, we do need to work together on comprehensive immigration reform. Now, I know this is a complicated and volatile issue. And I want to discuss one piece of it, because I think that this is that point that we need to underscore.

Immigration is a federal responsibility. But for years state and local governments have been bearing the brunt of its costs to our schools, our hospitals, social services, law enforcement and others.

(APPLAUSE)

I hear this from my country executives, from my mayors, from my city councilmembers. You know, New York is a very welcoming place to immigrants. We are proud of our immigrant tradition. Lady Liberty stands there right in the harbor, welcoming people, and we take that seriously. You know, more than 40 percent of the population of more than 8 million in New York City were not born in this country. So we believe in immigration.

But we also believe in the federal government doing its part, because not one of you wrote the laws or directed the enforcement that caused you to have to spend money dealing with the problems that really should be the responsibility of the federal government.

(APPLAUSE)

I have sponsored an amendment that would not only put in federal dollars to the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program -- the so called SCAAP program, which is funding to the states -- but would also provide money to state and local governments to pay for immigration- related health and education costs.

(APPLAUSE)

And what I have tried to do in this amendment is to say that sometimes when money goes to the states -- you know, back after 9/11, I introduced the first legislation which said, whatever homeland security money you have, send it directly to the cities, the towns, the municipalities.

CLINTON: Save some for the states, but if you put it through the state governments -- as the wife of a former governor, I know it does take a while to get down to where you are at the grassroots level.

So on homeland security, on immigration, I want to require that 70 percent of the funds going to state for health and education be passed down to localities within 180 days. No excuses, get it out of the state government, get it down to you, so you can have those resources to deal with the problems you face on a daily basis.

(APPLAUSE)

Third, we need to break down the barriers to owning a home in America. Now, homeownership is at the heart of the American dream. And I share your concern about what's happening in the subprime housing market.

We have seen for several years now people buying mortgages with rates that suddenly skyrocket, leaving them scrambling to refinance, or being forced to default altogether. And, frankly, lax standards in this industry have led to our recent market turmoil.

Let's work together to curb predatory lending and abusive practices, and to educate homebuyers. We need to ensure that homebuyers know what they are signing; you know, what it is that they're actually agreeing to.

Because it is one of our goals to have as many people owning homes as possible. And, again, speaking from my experience in New York, there are families who are paying rent who could afford a home but they don't have the experience or the knowledge about how to do that and they're easy prey for some of those who are, frankly, selling products that will perhaps get them into trouble.

So we need more financial literacy and we need to work together.

You know, Mayor Delfino from White Plains is here. He and I have a program together where we brought in some of the large employers and encouraged them to provide financial literacy and education to their employees, because it's becoming a problem for employers if their employees have to live so far away that commuting time is very disruptive, if you're running a hospital or a utility or some other large employer.

So there are good ideas around, and we need to be looking for those good ideas and putting them into practice on a broader basis.

Fourth, we should restore our investment in the Community Development Block Grants. Many of you have used those federal dollars to revitalize your towns and your cities.

(APPLAUSE)

And I want to get back to evidence-based decision-making. I think that would be really helpful. Because if we actually try to look at the facts, we may still disagree about what is to be done, but we won't be having these pitched battles where somebody says, "Well, this is what I believe," and somebody else says, "No, this is what I believe."

Well, let's look at the evidence.

You know, my wonderful predecessor, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, famously said, "Everyone's entitled to his own opinion but no one is entitled to his own facts."

Well, we now have some recent studies that show that for every dollar the CDBG program invests in our communities, it leverages $3 in private funding and investment.

Now, if someone offered you the chance to buy a stock with that kind of return, I think we would all jump at the chance. Well, let's be smart about how we leverage investments in our cities.

And every year the president tries to cut this program. And I hear from many of my mayors and local officials that CDBG funding is the most important federal aid they get for affordable housing, job creation and economic development.

CLINTON: And finally, I believe strongly we must restore full funding for the COPS program. We know that...

(APPLAUSE)

... we had a low crime rate during much of the '90s and the early part of this century. And a lot of things happened to bring that about.

We did have the COPS program, which put more police on the streets, more police in schools, more police in all kinds of settings. We had a real commitment to community policing. We took assault weapons off the street. We did things that actually gave police and local officials, you know, more support to do the hard work of keeping the criminals at bay and preventing crime, not just responding to it.

Well, over the past two years, violent crime has been increasing by double digits in cities across America. When I get visits from my mayors, whether it's, you know, Mayor Brown from Buffalo, or Mayor Duffy from Rochester, or Mayor Jennings from Albany or any of my mayors, the number one topic they now talk about, which wasn't the case when I first became senator, is the increase in crime, in gang- related violence, in gun crimes.

Eighty percent of cities surveyed in another recent report noted an increase in robberies. Sixty-seven percent had an increase in aggravated assaults with guns. Homicide is up 20 percent or more in some cities.

Now, these are not just numbers; you know that very well. This is about not only the victims of crime and their families. It is about people feeling unsafe again in our communities, people who are afraid to let their kids go outside and play, seniors who lock themselves in, afraid to go anywhere.

We had a horrible mugging the other day in New York City: A 101- year-old woman in her walker was attacked in an elevator. Now, she was pretty feisty...

(LAUGHTER)

... and she just showed great New York resilience and basically got the guy to run off, because she was able to prevent him from taking advantage of her.

But that was on the front page of our papers. Imagine how that makes every widow living alone, every older person, everybody -- we've got to go back to making crime reduction a number one objective in our country. And that means we've got to reinstate and fund the COPS program so we put more police on the street.

(APPLAUSE)

Well, I believe that if we look at some of these issues, which are all in your agenda, we're going to be making progress together.

But at the end of the day, we've got to do better. We've got to show, once again, that government is competent and effective.

Now, what does it make us feel when we see our soldiers coming home from Iraq and not getting the health care they deserve, not getting the disability benefits that they have earned because of the duty they did for all of us?

What does it mean when we still have more than 90,000 people living in trailers along the Gulf Coast?

You know, there's just so many problems that really are beneath us as a nation.

You know, we are the problem-solving nation. We can do anything we set our minds to.

In fact, our unbridled faith in the future and our optimism has always set us across -- set us apart from anybody else across the globe.

CLINTON: And, you know, sometimes we're kidded by it. People say, you know, "The Americans -- they're so optimistic, you know, they believe they can do anything." I do. And I think all of you do as well.

But we've got to have leadership that not only calls us to doing what is necessary but is competent in delivering what we have to do together.

And that is something that is nonpartisan, non-ideological.

(APPLAUSE)

We need to rise to the occasion again.

We need to move toward universal health care coverage. It is time that we provide quality, affordable health care for every American.

(APPLAUSE)

And we can do that.

We need to move toward a new energy future, where we use homegrown energy; we use the sun and the wind and what we produce agriculturally; and we unleash the innovation of the American genius to come up with even new ways of producing energy, to end our addiction to foreign oil.

(APPLAUSE)

And we need to be serious about dealing with climate change. Those of us who live in coastal states know that it is not some far- off threat.

You know, insurance companies are canceling policies along the ocean in New York and Long Island and New York City. And I know that's happening in other places. We need a serious -- a serious program to address that.

We need to get serious, too, about education. We need a universal pre-K program because, by the time some kids get to kindergarten, it's too late for them. They will be behind their entire lives.

And we know that it's one of the best investments we could make, if we are serious about lifting up the skills of our workforce.

(APPLAUSE)

And finally, we need to, once again, open the doors of college to every person who is willing to work hard to go to school.

(APPLAUSE)

It is now so much more expensive than it used to be.

So we have a big agenda before us here at home. And abroad, we've got to reestablish belief in America's values, and we have to reach out and create new alliances and more friends.

Because no matter what the challenge we confront, whether it is what to do in Iraq or dealing with global terrorism or HIV/AIDS or the spread of diseases like malaria that are moving north now because, unfortunately, the climate is warmer and the mosquitoes can live at higher latitudes, or whether it is any problem that cuts across national boundaries, we have to work together.

And we know we can do this because we've always done it in our history.

You know, I was reminded the other day that back in 1947 there was a smallpox scare in New York City. Someone was a carrier, had gotten off an airplane and gotten sick. And so the whole city knew that smallpox had come to New York City.

Well, in just one month, the New York City Health Department vaccinated more than 6 million people. They didn't have computers. They just lined people up. They sent out notices. They went door to door. They did it because they knew they had to do it. And they rose to the occasion.

We can bring the same sense of commitment and daring and optimism back to our country.

And I know that working together we can renew the promise of our cities. We can overcome any challenge. Because after all, we believe in and we represent the spirit of our great country.

Thank you all for everything you do. And I look forward to working with you in the future. Thank you very much.

(APPLAUSE)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON DELIVERS REMARKS AT THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FIRE FIGHTERS BIPARTISAN 2007 PRESIDENTIAL FORUM, 3/14/2007

CLINTON: Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you all. Thanks so much, and thanks for last night, too.

(LAUGHTER)

It's an honor and a pleasure to be here this morning. It was a lot of fun to be here last night.

(LAUGHTER)

You know, as I look around this room, which is packed with people whom I admire so much, I see a lot of old friends. And it's been an honor to stand with you.

We've stood together in good times and bad times. We've stood together when it seemed as though the darkness would never end, and when we finally saw the light.

So it is just a personal honor of the highest degree to be here today.

(APPLAUSE)

And I want to thank, also, my friend and your great leader for that wonderful introduction.

You know, Harold and Vinnie have been the heart and soul of leading this great, great union. And we've been through a lot. But the thing about going through tough times with Harold and Vinnie on your side is that you know that you're not going to be alone.

And that has meant the world to those of us from New York. And we have a lot of firefighters, from across New York, here today. And I want to thank you all for everything you do every single day.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, when I think about the work that you do and the service and commitment that you have given to your nation, I know that, for all of you, courage is a job requirement.

You don't make this decision to be a firefighter easily or quickly. You have to think about the sacrifice and you have to think about you families.

For you, when you go to work, when you go to that firehouse or that station, these are not just your colleagues; these are members of your extended family.

And I recognize how much this family, both the one that you leave at home, as you kiss your wife goodbye or you tuck you son into bed, are part of the commitment that you've made.

And I want to also thank your family members. Because it's not easy to see you walk out the door, to see you leave for that shift and just wait to make sure you've come home safely again.

So I want to express my gratitude to your families and to everyone who love you and support you in the work that you do every single day.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, Harold referred to our meeting that we had on the morning of September 12. On the day before, September 11, not only our country but the entire world saw for themselves what firefighters are made of.

You were the ones who ran into the fire. You were the ones who ran into the dust, into those collapsing buildings. And for some of your brothers and sisters, it was the last time you saw them.

But people who were not even on duty dropped everything they were doing to be there that day.

CLINTON: People who didn't even work for the FDNY, but who worked out on Long Island, who worked in Westchester, who worked in Connecticut, who worked in New Jersey, dropped everything they were doing.

And pretty soon, teams started coming from around the country, everybody saying, "We want to be there. We want to watch your back. We want to help search that wreckage to see if we can find anybody still alive."

When Harold and I spoke, it was a time of shock and confusion. Harold was kind enough to describe what I said to him, but I want to tell you what he said to me. He said, "We will stand with New York. Firefighters across this country and even across our border to the north will be there for you."

Well, Harold, you were true to your word. Not only you, but firefighters and paramedics and others poured in to our city. You shared equipment with us. You raised money for us. You worked side by side with us. And you prayed with us.

You were there when we needed you. And I want you to know that I will be there with you when you need me.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, we have to put this into a little bit of a context today. Because I know that many of you, including Harold and Vinnie (ph) were perhaps a little bit unsure about me when I started running. Now, that happens to me sometimes.

(LAUGHTER)

In fact, you might recall that back in 2000, you actually endorsed my opponent. But I never saw that as any kind of obstacle to working on behalf of your needs and your interests, just as when I ran for the Senate in New York I said I wanted to be a senator who represented everybody, people who were for me, people who were against me, people who didn't have an opinion, and I wanted to find ways we could move a common agenda forward.

And of course, a crisis brought us all together. And we rolled up our sleeves. And over the years, I've made wonderful friends with many of you. And I was very proud in my last election, to have the support of the New York firefighters. That meant the world to me.

Because without fail, we have to stand together. We have a lot of big problems that we're facing. And I think we can, once again, reassert America's leadership at home, restore our values, fulfill the promise of America, and get back to leading the world in the right way.

Now, that starts with restoring what I call the basic bargain. So many of us grew up with that. You know, we were raised to believe that if you worked hard and you played by the rules, you'd be able to build a better life for yourself and your family.

Well, I don't think in the last six years our country has actually been living up to that basic bargain. The leadership here in Washington seems to ignore middle class and hardworking families across our country.

CLINTON: Under this president's leadership household debt has soared, health care costs have skyrocketed, assuming that you have it. Wages have remained stagnant.

Now, corporate profits are up, and productivity is up, which means that Americans are working harder than anybody in the world. But we're not getting rewarded.

I'll tell you who is getting rewarded. Companies like Halliburton are getting rewarded with no-bid contracts. Then they move their CEOs across the ocean to another country and leave us hanging right here at home.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll tell you something else that we are going to have to deal with: the alternative minimum tax, which falls heavily on a lot of you and your families.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, for six years I've been saying, you know, with all due respect, do the billionaires in America need more tax cuts? Don't you think we ought to cut the taxes on middle-income people, and particularly those who are going to be hit by the alternative minimum tax?

(APPLAUSE)

You know, for six long years our president has not seen the vast majority of Americans. Not our middle class. Not our working families. He's looked right through them. To him, they're invisible.

You know, if you're a child sitting in a crumbling school you're invisible.

If you're a small-business owner who worries about energy costs or someone who can't afford to fill up your tank, you're invisible.

If you're a hardworking parent who needs affordable child care while you go to work, you're invisible.

Even if you're a soldier returning from combat who needs health care and disability compensation you are invisible.

Well, those days are over. You know, when we look...

(APPLAUSE)

When we look at the way our first responders have been treated, if you're a paramedic who got sick after 9/11, if you're a federal fire fighter who can't qualify for worker's compensation or disability retirement, if you're a retired firefighter who can't afford health insurance, well, you're invisible, too. It's great for the photo-ops, but how about taking care of the people who have taken care of us across our country?

(APPLAUSE)

Well, I want to make clear today you're not invisible to the people of our country, and you're sure not invisible to me. And when we retake the White House, you will no longer be invisible to the president of the United States of America.

(APPLAUSE)

And I want to say in this public setting that when I'm in the White House I'm going to be there for you, whenever you need me, on whatever you need me for, because there isn't anything more important to me than taking care of our first responders. It is part of our national security. It is part of our moral obligation.

CLINTON: And being there for you means continuing the fight to ensure that you have everything you need to do your job: the equipment, the people, whatever it takes.

So let me tell you, when George W. Bush tried to cut the funding for the SAFER Act, which I co-sponsored, and the FIRE Act, I took that personally. And with my colleagues, we fought him. And when he did it again, we fought him again. And I'm going to keep on fighting until FIRE and SAFER are fully funded, whatever it takes.

(APPLAUSE)

Now being there for you also means caring for every fire fighter, every police officer, every paramedic, every volunteer or worker who has fallen ill in the aftermath of September 11.

It wasn't just people from New York who responded that day, and the days to follow, and the months to follow. It was people from all over our country.

And when I first visited the site, in the afternoon of September 12, I could barely see anything. The dark cloud was so thick. But I could smell it, I could taste it, I could feel it.

As I watched the first fire fighters walking out of that curtain of darkness, covered in black soot, barely able to stand, dragging their axes behind them, I knew that the effects of 9/11 would last long after September 11.

Within days, the so-called World Trade Center cough began to appear. Young men and women in the prime of their lives developed asthma and bronchitis and laryngitis, and their livers were polluted, and their lungs were failing. And people who before September 11 could lift three times their body weight could barely stand. They were so bent over in pain.

They couldn't sleep lying flat in their beds anymore. They had to sit up all night long. People who used to be able to run miles without stopping, could no longer breathe going up a flight of stairs. Working hand in hand with many of you and with the IAFF, we created a program to screen and monitor those who were sick. And we got $90 million to expand it.

CLINTON: And when President Bush tried to take $125 million back, we knew we had to draw the line. And you, once again, came in and helped us win that fight.

Let's just say the president picked a fight with the wrong people. We won it.

(APPLAUSE)

But we didn't stop there. With your help, I was able to introduce legislation asking for more than $1.9 billion for medical and mental health monitoring and treatment.

We're going to keep working on this, not just this year and next year, but as long as our first responders, our workers, our volunteers and residents need help.

Being there for you also means getting smart about homeland security. As you know, all too well, we confront a new enemy and a new kind of warfare. It's really the warfare of cowards. It's people who sneak around and blow themselves up or place bombs in cars, who have a philosophy of nihilism. You know, they may dress it up in a kind of perverse version of religion, but it's really about destruction and death.

And it is imperative that we stand against them. Their warfare is not conducted by armies or navies, but by criminals, by insurgents, by militias driven by this twisted hate.

And it's been frustrating for many of us, because we can't get the resources to match the rhetoric. We get a lot of tough rhetoric out of Washington, but when it comes to paying for over time, getting you the equipment you need, not the equipment they want to give you, providing the money directly to local communities and not passing it through the states, well, we haven't gotten what we know we need to protect our country.

And in this latest budget, the president is proposing to cut funds for first responders at the Department of Homeland Security to the tune of $1.7 billion. Well, the way I see it, saying you believe in homeland security without funding first responders is like saying you believe in building a hospital without doctors and nurses.

If we don't fund you, we're not funding our first line of defense. And we're going to need to work together to make that happen.

(APPLAUSE)

And as Harold knows, and all my folks from New York know, we have been fighting for interoperable communications since September 12th.

CLINTON: We have put in legislation. We've asked for more money. But when firefighters can't talk to police officers; when emergency responders in one state can't talk to those from another -- we not only saw it on September 11; we saw it again during Hurricane Katrina, a crisis that really, once again, put firefighters in the forefront.

And just think about what's happening, where your brothers and sisters are trying to operate out of trailers, and they're still using ruined equipment that we still haven't replaced.

What was a natural disaster was turned into a national disgrace.

(APPLAUSE)

And we need to get the funds directly where they are needed.

(APPLAUSE)

And being there for you means trying to end the war in Iraq in the right way. Because firefighters have fought and died in Iraq. And we were heartbroken to learn that those who had fought and been injured were languishing in Walter Reed.

I went out there, a week ago Friday, early in the morning, to meet with a bunch of soldiers from New York. Some of them had been tied up in the bureaucratic red tape until they were just beyond words.

They couldn't figure out, what had I done to deserve this? I served my country, active duty, National Guard or Reserve. Why am I being treated like that?

Well, the 2006 election sent a strong message that we do not want our young men and women in uniform to be in the middle of a sectarian civil war, where they don't know who is shooting at them and they can't figure out whose side they're supposed to be on.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, we're trying to introduce some rationality into this, in the Congress, trying to stop the escalation, because I profoundly believe that putting more of our young men and women into harm's way, unless the Iraqis decide to defend themselves, we cannot end this war for them.

If they're not going to stand up and take responsibility, we should not lose another American life. We should end this escalation now.

(APPLAUSE)

I hope that the president will extricate us from Iraq before he leaves office.

CLINTON: But let me assure you, if he doesn't, when I'm president, I will.

(APPLAUSE)

And finally, being there for you means standing side by side with you in the fight for your most fundamental rights. As Harold said in his introduction, I believe that it is absolutely essential to the way America works that people be given the right to organize and bargain collectively.

(APPLAUSE)

Nearly 90 years ago, when 36 delegates gathered for the first IAFF convention, 84-hour work weeks were the norm, and terrible conditions were a fact of life.

You know why that's no longer the case? Because of you. You organized. You unionized. You stood up for your rights. You said, "We're not going to be invisible. We're doing our part. You have to give us safe working conditions, fair treatment, and the right to bargain."

(APPLAUSE)

But some people still don't get it. You know, they say that collective bargaining will undermine our national security. They think you haven't earned the right to organize.

Well, you know what I say to them? I say, "Would you change places, would you go into that fire, would you stand on those collapsing floors and under those crumbling ceilings?"

Well, the way I see it, when you plunge head first into burning buildings for a living, you have more than earned the right to organize for better conditions on the job.

(APPLAUSE)

So make no mistake about it, the days of George Bush thinking the union bug is something he needs to squash are over.

(LAUGHTER)

We are here to stand up for the rights of people who pull children out of raging waters and rescue people from flaming rooftops. We are here to stand up for the people who stand up for us.

Now, we have a lot of work ahead of us, and we can get some small victories along the way until we finally get the majorities we need to completely have an agenda that we support in the Senate. They can still stop a lot of what we believe in, unfortunately, but we just have to keep electing more people who see the world the way we do. And we certainly will make a lot more progress when we take back the White House.

You know, back after the days of September 11th, so many of you came to me and said that the families of firefighters who'd been killed were confronting piles of paperwork just to get the benefits they were owed.

CLINTON: They were told it would take weeks or months, and the families didn't have that kind of time.

So again, working with Harold and his team, we put together a bill. And my friend Jerry Nadler sponsored it in the House. And, within a week, that bill passed into law.

Now when the bill passed, we didn't declare victory or do some kind of big celebration. Because the truth is that in the end, there was nothing we could do to give back to those families the people they had love and lost. All we could do is to come together as a team and help as best we could.

And, in the end, we just followed the basic rule you live by: You never leave a brother or a sister behind.

Well, that's how I've tried to serve in the Senate. That's how I've tried to set my priorities. And I want you to know that if I do have the honor and the opportunity to be your president, that's what I will continue to do. Now, people who know me will tell you I don't back down from a fight, and others use more colorful language sometimes about me.

(LAUGHTER)

But that's just fine with me. I don't care what they say. I just care about what we do. That is what is important to me. And because I'm proud to fight for you because you fight for us, I'm going to stay on your side.

I'm not, in any way, concerned about the fight that we have ahead, because I know we can win this fight. I know that if we stand together, we get our message out to America. If we steel ourselves to all of the criticism and the counter-attacks and the stereotypes and everything that they'll put out, then we'll be victorious.

I have a little experience in staying the course...

(LAUGHTER)

... and in sticking with people who stick with me.

(APPLAUSE)

So, you know, St. Augustine said a long time ago that hope is really the combination of two things: the combination of anger at the way things are, and courage to change things are.

Well, living by hope, and understanding we can't be satisfied with what we see before us on homeland security or collective bargaining, but having the courage to step out and try to make a different future, is one of the reasons why I admire over the course of your work on behalf of fire fighters.

And I am thrilled and honored to stand with you, and together we will make it clear that those of us who believe that courage and anger about what is leads to hope, means that we will change America for the better.

Thank you, all, so much. And God bless you for everything you do. Thank you. Take care.

"Special Report," ABC, 3/262007

(Off-camera) Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was the first to respond. And this morning on 'Good Morning America,' Robin Roberts joined the Senator onstage in Des Moines, Iowa. Senator Clinton answered many questions during the course of the show. And some parts of that session did not air on GMA, so here's an exclusive look at those answers.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) And we now, I wanna welcome ABC's - primary anchor, Lisa Carponelli, who has some questions for the Senator before we open it up to the, for the people here.

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Robin, thank you very much. Senator, it is big news here in Iowa, we found out on Friday, there were rumblings that Governor Tom Vilsack is expected to endorse you later on today. We spoke with Robin about this earlier, what does that endorsement do for your campaign here in Iowa?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, I'm proud to have Tom's endorsement, as well as Christie, because, you know, I think the people in Iowa know what they've done for the state, what their values are, what they care about. And to have them endorse my campaign, I think says a lot about what I would do as president.

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) What will the Vilsacks do for you? Will they campaign on your behalf, will they attempt to, to raise funds for you here in the state?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, Governor Vilsack's going to be one of my - national co-chairs, so he will be, not only campaigning for me here in Iowa, but around the country, and Christie's going to be one of my state co-chairs. So she will work with a number of people who have already committed to my campaign. And we're gonna be traveling across the state, between now and the caucuses, and we're going to be asking Governor Vilsack to travel around the country, talking about the issues that are important not only in Iowa, but to Americans.

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Does Governor Vilsack have a position in your Cabinet should you be elected?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Governor Vilsack is one of the most talented, experienced, accomplished public servants we have in America, and I certainly hope that he will be part of my team when I'm president.

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Great, Senator, thank you. Another question that we have is, especially here in Iowa, we have there are estimates between 44,000 and 55,000 uninsured children in the state. I know you recently introduced legislation that would insure all children throughout the United States. How is that going to benefit folks here in Iowa?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, it will on several counts. First, I have to give Governor Vilsack a lot of credit, because the HAWK-I, I Program, which is what the children's health insurance program here in Iowa is called, has done a tremendous job of reaching out and insuring children from working families who are without insurance because their families don't have it through their employer, but they make too much money to get the public program known as Medicaid. So, Iowa's already done a good job, but as you say, there are gaps, and children are being left out.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

So, I've proposed a legislation, and again, you can go to my website, HillaryClinton.com, to get the details that would make it possible for every child in Iowa to be insured, and for families to be able to buy in to the insurance program that the state runs if they don't have insurance at a small fee, so that, you know, no child, no family would be left with that terrible feeling in the pit of your stomach that your child can't get the health care that you know that your child need. So, it would really give Iowa a few more resources and tools to be able to cover every single child.

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) You've commented in the past that you've learned from your experience in the early '90s and that you wanna take smaller steps. Is this obviously one of those smaller steps towards universal health coverage for all Americans?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, it's a really big step, because I think it's time that every child in America have health insurance, and it helps to lay the groundwork toward getting to universal health care. But we've got another 20 months of President Bush and I don't think he's inclined to take any big, big steps so as the Congress, we're trying to take some steps that will solve some problems before, you know, we have a Democratic president. And it's exciting, because the President's budget was going to cut the children's health insurance program, which would have meant 500,000 children would have lost their insurance. I think that's wrong, so we're gonna try to add to it, not cut from it.

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) And how do we pay for that?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, we will pay for by looking at some of the expenditures in the healthcare system. For example, there are overpayments to HMOs under Medicare that many of us that think could be diverted to take care of children's health. There are other expenditures that we need to control in the health care system. And then there are still a lot of corporate loopholes and tax giveaways within the federal budget that have only gotten bigger in the last six years that we need to start eliminating in order to put money into things like children's health care.

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) There was a, a quick question I, I had from a gal at the gym that I saw...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Good for you. You should go to the gym.

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) ...well, here - here's the, here's the question about that. There, there, we often hear about complaints when you talk about universal health care or socialized medicine, which is another phrase that you use, that there's a long delay when it comes to getting treatments, especially in the UK or in Canada, you have to wait, wait, wait for that kind of treatment. My first question is, how would we prevent any sort of abuses of a universal system, and then secondly, would there be any sort of benefit for people that do actively choose a healthy lifestyle?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, as in the latter, yes, I think there should be. I think that, you know, when you go for life insurance, you pay a higher rate if you're a smoker. We need to start changing people's behaviors in a way that incentivizes good eating, exercises the things we know will actually make you healthier, save you money, and save the health care system money. You know, we have a representative here from the American Diabetes Association, we have an epidemic of Diabetes, and we have younger and younger people being diagnosed with diabetes.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

We need to get back to get back to physical education in our schools. When I was growing up in Illinois, we had mandatory physical education, I wasn't always happy about it, but we did it and I'm the better for it. Well, we stopped doing that. We have a lot of parents who are afraid to let their children - play outside today, because they're worried about what happens. So, you know, a child's in front of the video game or the Internet, or the television. So, we've got to begin to do more to provide healthy food in school, Senator Harkin has been a leader on this.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

He has made it very clear that we should use locally produced food in our schools and I am trying to support him on expending that. So, there's so much we can do to incentivize wellness and good health. And when it comes to what kind of universal health care system we want, our system will not be the same as other countries. But I think the facts need to be cleared up. You know, we pay more than everybody in the world. We don't cover everybody. So there are some people who not only wait in line, they don't get health care 'til the very last minute in our own country.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

And we have a problem when it comes to making it obvious that we could save money by doing a better job in health care. You will be better taken care of if you have a chronic condition like diabetes in many other countries. And that's shameful. We should be doing the best when it comes to health care. So we don't wanna have the problems that other countries encounter. But I would like to have some of the benefits because they have higher quality outcomes on average than we do. So let's take what we do well, and let's learn from other places, and let's have a uniquely American solution for health care.

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) And, Senator, speaking specifically to Iowans here, I'm curious, as you travel around the country, how do you find Iowans as voters, relative to say folks from New Hampshire or from California?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Very engaged, very interested in the issues. The first time I came in this campaign and we had a, a big town hall meeting, it was exciting because people came ready to ask about what was on their minds. And I'm, I'm just so pleased and, and, frankly, a, a little surprised that this has taken off so fast. I don't think anybody predicted it. My husband didn't start running for president until October of 1991...

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) That's right.

(Off-camera) That's right.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

...and here it is March. But I think that's in part because people are anxious to start doing things. You know, there's a feeling that the country has been going in the wrong direction for six years. Let's get back doing what Americans do best. We're the best in the world at solving problems, at rolling up our sleeves, at getting things done. And I think people in Iowa know that. That's the record here. As I've said, when it came to children's health care, Iowa led the pack. Your schools have historically performed better than average when it came to looking at how students perform around the country. So let's take some good, old-fashioned common sense and start applying it to these problems we have and set some goals for our self again.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) All right. Lisa, thank you very much.

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Yes. Thank you, Robin.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) And you wanna hear from Iowans, don't you?

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Of course.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

I do.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Let's, their questions that we have. Karol Joenks, she has been a, a VA nurse for 33 years, is that right?

KAROL JOENKS (PRESIDENT

Yes, I was. I retired five years ago.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Good for you. Good for you. What is your question?

KAROL JOENKS (PRESIDENT

My question has to do with nurses of Iowa. I currently serve the Iowa Nurses Association as their president. And I worked in 10 years to rank near the bottom of all the states in Medicare reimbursement. The problem is when the rates were set, states were paid based on cost. And Iowa was most efficient. They were very efficient in how we covered and served our Iowans. But nurses are the lowest paid in the nation. Now, we have two territories that are lower paid, Guam and Puerto Rico. However, realizing all of these, it's a difficult subject because those states that have higher representation don't care to change anything.

KAROL JOENKS (PRESIDENT

But I was wondering about your thoughts on how we could possibly more, be more equitable in the reimbursement rates for Medicare, not only for all lowans, I'm particularly interested in lowans and lowan nurses...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Right.

KAROL JOENKS (PRESIDENT

...but across the nation.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Well, it's a great question and I have heard a lot about it here in Iowa, from many people. You have some of your elected representatives and states senators here, and they certainly have raised it with me. I have the same problem in, in my own state. We have sections in New York that get a much lower reimbursement. So, you know, I go to see a hospital in one county and they say, 'Why are we reimbursed at a lower rate than the hospital in the county next door?' The system makes no sense. And it rewards high costs instead of trying to get to good care at the most efficient costs.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

So we have to take a look at this because I think that it's not right that some parts of our country are having a much higher reimbursement rate and are utilizing the (inaudible), but they don't get a better outcome. So we need to start looking at how we - try to provide a uniform base to treat people here in Iowa and across America. But specifically, as to nurses, you know, back when I began my Senate term, I authored legislation for the Nurse Reinvestment Equality Act because nurses are at the heart of how patients are taken care of. And nursing care has a greater connection to patient outcome than any other part of the system. And we are losing our, we, we are losing our nurses to retirement.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

We are losing our nurses because they tell me they're not going to be put in working conditions where they don't feel they can provide good patient care. So they're - they're leaving hospitals for other settings if they stay in nursing. We need to get more young people to go to nursing training and school. That means we more, we need more nursing schools. We have a waiting list for people who wanna go into nursing, but we don't have enough faculties and schools to train the people who wanna do it. We need to pay and treat nurses with respect.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

You know, nurses deserve the kind of recognition and status that they're high performance demands. And finally, as we move to our universal health care, nurses can be delegated a lot of tasks that they could do that would be given a reimbursement for nurses, that right now nurses in many states are prevented from doing. So, as you could tell, I'm a big fan of nurses and I want nurses to play a more leading role in delivering health care in America.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) You got a big smile on us, Karol, for that. We have a question from a small business owner because it - as you know, Senator, so difficult for businesses when it comes to health care. And Sheldon Ohringer, what is your question, sir?

SHELDON OHRINGER (BUSINESSMAN)

Good morning, Senator Clinton.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Good morning.

SHELDON OHRINGER (BUSINESSMAN)

My business partner, partner and I operate three outsource service centers in rural Iowa. We compete with India, Philippines, and other - offshore locations every day. We are growing business. We subsidize health insurance for our employees. Insurance rates have increased 10% to 15% since we began in 2003. We need to keep our cost down to remain competitive, to keep quality jobs here. How do you propose control in health care cost for small business owners so that we can continue to be competitive in the global economy and create quality jobs in real America where people wanna live?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

It's a great question. And, and congratulations on your success in this competitive global economy. I think that your small business should be able to bond together with small businesses across Iowa and across the country. And you should be able to buy into the federal employees' health benefit plan. You should be able to get the low prices that the federal government negotiates for federal employees including members of Congress. You get strength with buying power. The more you have in a pool of people, that's why the cost for Medicare is so low. You have so many millions of people in Medicare, and they have a very low cost in delivering it.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Of course they don't have profit and the administration that you have in the private insurance market, but we can, even if you keep private insurance get the cost down, we need to end insurance discrimination. One of the reasons why cost go up so much is because insurance companies working with your small business really hold it against you if you have anybody who you employ who needs health care. You know, if a child is born with a problem, or someone develops a heart condition, everybody is penalized in your employment. Well, we need to tell the insurance companies that they've got to guarantee health coverage for everybody at an affordable cost.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

And if they don't wanna play by those rules then they should just not be in the health insurance market anymore, because what they're doing now is raising your rates making it more difficult for you to provide insurance, and it's becoming so expensive that a lot of businesses are dropping coverage. So one of the approaches is to say, 'Look, let's try to put you in a big pool.' Let's have more restrictions on what insurance companies can do to you so that they have to be more competitive cost wise. The alternative is to take this burden off the businesses' back. You know, you're the only kind of business in the world competing with your competitors who has to provide health insurance.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

And a lot of businesses are now saying to me, 'You know what? We don't want this responsibility. We'd rather be focused on our business, not focused on health care.' So that's another one of the options for you, to get out of having to provide health care. But to make sure that everybody who works for you does have health care. So these are a couple of the approaches we should consider.

LISA CARPONELLI (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Senator, follow up. How long would a program like this take to implement?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well, it depends upon how much political support we have for it, because let's remember that we know we need to change how we do this. We can't afford this system any longer. But unfortunately, there are a lot of vested interests that make a lot of money off the system as it is. You know, the insurance employment has gone up even though the number of people insured in America has gone down because we have more uninsured people. Well, we've got to persuade everyone politically to say, 'Look, we can do better than what we're doing.' I think we could start on the road the first year I'm president. We could begin to make the changes that would put us on the track to having universal health care coverage.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Senator, thank you very much. Lisa, and never enough time. And you've been very gracious, and still staying and, and answering the questions from people that are assembled here today. Thank you.

ROB SIMMELKJAER (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) (Inaudible). We'll have more of 'Good Morning America's' town hall meeting in just a while so stay with us. We'll - have more when we return from the short break. That's where Senator Clinton will take a shot at some answers on our video - e-mail section. So don't go away.

COMMERCIAL BREAK

ROB SIMMELKJAER (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) And welcome back to ABC News Now. Senator Hillary Clinton joined 'Good Morning America's' Robin Roberts at a town hall meeting in Des Moines, Iowa this morning.

After answering some of Robin's questions, the Democratic presidential candidate responded to questions directly from our viewers.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Senator, we're gonna get to some of the e-mail questions that we have. Starting with Tiffany in LA, who says, 'One of the most common arguments against nationalized health care is that the quality of care and research will be negatively impacted if health care is nationalized. What would be done to ensure and or improve the quality of care?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Well, I wanna make clear that there is a difference between having a health care system that provides quality, affordable health care to every American and having a national health care system where there's only one source of care and the government runs it. That is what's called the single payer system. And the single payer system can be done in a variety of ways. Medicare is a single payer system. And most people on Medicare are satisfied. They wish that, you know, there are few more things covered or maybe they would like to have a little more access to a particular specialist. But in general, survey after survey says the people on Medicare are satisfied with Medicare.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

So when we talk, let's, let's be really clear, because there's a lot of misinformation. And frankly a lot of scare tactics about what universal health care would mean. And I'm an expert on this, and I have the scars to show from what we went through in '93 and '94. And so, that's why I started by saying we have to reduce costs and improve quality no matter what we do. If we kept the system we have, it's very hard to do that because there are no incentives to change what people are paid to do. I'll give you a quick example. If you're pre-diabetic or diabetic, it's hard to find insurance that will actually pay for you to go to - a nutritionist or pay for you to go to podiatrist to check your feet, but they will pay for you to have your foot amputated.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Now, that's just backwards. It cost more money. It causes a lot more hospitalization. It's wrong. So what I'm arguing is we need to improve quality and reduce costs. And one of the first ways to do that is to get electronic medical records so that we know what we're doing. I talked to one of the people here during the break who's a nurse at the VA here in Iowa, who says that they've seen big improvements and quality, which is what all the research says, because the VA now uses electronic medical records. We need to have that in private health care, every doctor's office, every hospital. That costs some money, but it'll save us about $100 billion a year.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

So I think we can do what needs to be done to reduce cost and redundancy and duplication, as well as improve quality by focusing on wellness and prevention, continuing research. I'd like to see us get back to funding the NIH. Under the Bush administration, we've begun to cut the NIH. So, you know, Tiffany, I understand why you would ask that question because, you know, there are a lot of people who are gonna have to change, and maybe they won't make quite as much money in the kind of system I foresee. And that, that causes them to get a little anxious and, kind of, raise all these scare tactics.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) We're gonna turn now to young adults because they make up the vast majority, the largest group of uninsured Americans.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

That's right.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Young. So we got together a group of young people in California. And one of them has a question for you, Senator.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Great.

RESIDENT OF CALIFORNIA (FEMALE)

(Inaudible) ?

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) The students wanna know...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

How can students be covered?

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Mm-hmm.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

I think a couple of different ways. First of all, a lot of young people are not covered because they were on their parents' plans, then they reach an age limit because a lot of insurance companies won't cover you if you're on your own or you hit 21. I think as long as you're a dependant, and especially if you have any health problems, your family should be able to keep you on their policy. In fact, I've introduced legislation so that young people who have illnesses or injuries are not cut off of their parents' policies and parents can continue to carry them. But many young people when they start to work, they go to work for employers who don't provide them health insurance. And a lot of young people don't think they need it because they're healthy.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

The problem is that even though that's true in general, you are not immune from accidents or from illness. And when that happens, a lot of young people are really in a difficult spot. So I think if we had choices of health care plans, again, going back to something like the federal employee health benefit plan, a lot of healthy young 20-somethings would say, you know, 'I'm healthy. I'm gonna get the minimal benefits with a catastrophic policy so that if I'm in a car accident or something like that happens to me.' That makes perfect sense if you're a single person taking care of yourself.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

But it's really important everybody be insured. Otherwise, if something does happen to you, the rest of us pay for it. And you may not get the health care that you need. So I think we can get the cost down for young people. And I would like to do that because I'd like to provide that option to them.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) A lot of people feel like they're rolling a dice every morning about their health care. They can't afford it. And two-thirds, did you all realize this? Two-thirds of Americans who do not have health insurance are working.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

That's right.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Two-thirds, they're working and can't afford the insurance. You are going to continue this conversation online at ABCNEWS.com. You'd agreed to answer some additional question. So thank you very much for that. And thank you all as well. And Hilary Duff, you're off the hook, Hilary Duff will be singing in New York when we come back. Thanks very much.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Thank you.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Yeah. But I think a lot of people were surprised by that. I know I was. There was about two-thirds...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

The people...

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) There's a - at the end...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

That's right.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Yeah.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

That's right.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Do you think that people who are not, they're just out on the streets? No, no, really.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

I know. I know.

FACILITATOR (FEMALE)

Okay, folks...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Now, I'd be happy to take a few questions that people didn't get to ask, if that's okay with you.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Oh, that's great.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Or do you have to break it all down and, and...

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) No, no, no, no, because we're still gonna have our (inaudible) goodbyes. We still...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Okay.

FACILITATOR (FEMALE)

(Inaudible) to be answered before. Could we read you some of the lines (inaudible) ?

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Sure, sure.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Sure, sure. Let's try...

COMMERCIAL BREAK

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

...system is. You know, here's a, you're - you're working?

AUDIENCE MEMBER (FEMALE)

I'm working. I work for non-profit organization.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

And you're doing everything you're supposed to do. You're doing such a good job. They wanna give you a raise, right? And yet you'll go up a little bit in income which means your children will be dropped from insurance. And I assume that your employer can't really afford you to give you insurance and you can't afford to go in the market place and buy insurance. So this is the perfect example what Robin was saying. More than two-thirds of people without insurance are in families where one or more adults are working. So I don't think it's right that you should have to make this choice.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

In the short run, I hope we'll be able to figure out a way to help you and, and we've got some state elected officials here and maybe one of them could talk to you and see if we can help you continue your coverage. You shouldn't have to turndown your raise to give your children health care. But in the longer run, we shouldn't have this. It's an absurd kind of difference. I mean, you know, you make $25,000. You're eligible. You make $25,100. You lose your coverage for your kids. So that's why we need to move toward universal health care coverage because I actually know people who turned down raises, turned down promotions because they'll lose their health care.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

So I, I hope we can help you here in Iowa, figure out a way to get both your raise and keep your coverage for your kids and, and I'll work with you and, and Chris who's back there, if you'll raise your hand, Chris who's working with me, if you'll talk afterwards and we'll see if there's anything we can do. But I introduced legislation last week to make it possible for families all the way up the income scale to not lose their insurance for their children, as I first stepped toward trying to get everybody insured. And congratulations on what you're doing, too.

AUDIENCE MEMBER (FEMALE)

(Inaudible) I appreciate it.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Are you Cindy?

CINDY (AUDIENCE MEMBER)

Yeah.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Yes, okay, thank you. Cindy, your question?

CINDY (AUDIENCE MEMBER)

I work in direct care. I'm not a nurse. I'm - I'm a certified CNA but I - I'm representing a lot of direct care workers that are doing the hands on care with people that need care. And my question is what are you gonna do, do to ensure that those who give hands-on care can afford to have, can have affordable health care themselves?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Thank, thank you for asking this. You know, among the largest group of people without insurance are people who work in health care, taking care of the rest of us. I mean stop and think about it in a minute, certified nurse assistant, technicians, others who were there, in nursing homes and in group homes, in hospitals, don't have insurance themselves, and - and that's what's so wrong about our system. You know, that work is absolutely essential to taking care of people. If we didn't have you and others who did the hands on work, who would do it? It's the same with childcare, a lot of people are doing childcare, don't have health insurance, same with long-term care.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

So if we don't take care of our health care workers, we will not be taken care of. And I believe that this is one of the most compelling moral reasons for us to have universal health care. And so I will do everything I can to get to universal health care. And you know, people say, 'Well, but it's expensive.' If we provide you with insurance then the cost of the care goes up. Well, that's true that's why we need to deal with some of the cause in the system and not take it out of the paychecks and healthcare of the people who do the hard work of taking care of us.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

One of the reasons why I think we can get to universal health care is because there's so much waste in the system, so much administrative cause, so much overhead. That's not going to the person who takes care of you, that's going to the people who push the paper, the bureaucrats who decide what a doctor can prescribe. We can cut a lot of that out and we'll have a lot more money that can go directly into care and make sure that people taking care of us as caregivers get health care themselves.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Roger and Cindy Goldwyn ask you a question and, Roger?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Hello. Thank you for coming.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Your, your husband was diagnosed with ALS nine years ago, was it?

CINDY GOLDWYN (HUSBAND IS DIAGNOSED WITH ALS NINE YEARS AGO)

Nine years.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Wow.

ROGER GOLDWYN (ALS PATIENT)

Good morning.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Good morning.

CINDY GOLDWYN (HUSBAND IS DIAGNOSED WITH ALS NINE YEARS AGO)

This is Roger and I'm his wife, Cindy. Roger was diagnosed with ALS or Lou Gehrig's disease nine years ago. He's a very atypical and another progression of his disease. We're very fortunate that he's still alive because that's not the, the typical case. Rogers' question for you Senator - Clinton, 'I'm 52 years old and I have ALS or Lou Gehrig's disease. My symptoms have progressed to where I require systems with virtually every daily activity. I have Medicare as well as full medical coverage from Blue Cross Blue Shield that I pay for privately.'

CINDY GOLDWYN (HUSBAND IS DIAGNOSED WITH ALS NINE YEARS AGO)

'With all that insurance, the majority of my care requirements are still not covered and my wife, Cindy, is left the total responsibility of my care. Of course, she now also has the burden of doing everything that else that she and I used to do together to manage our home as well as work. She teaches at Iowa State University. The burden on Cindy is overwhelming and we are just shocked at the inadequacy of our health care and social system to help us. I want to thank you for your past support of respite legislation and our ALS registry act. How would you address this daily care problem where families are left with inadequate options for caring for in the lead loved ones?' Thank you.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

Well, I'm, I'm so moved by your story and particularly how you're disease has progressed in a way it enables you to be here this morning and participate and say good morning and it, it's really wonderful to see that and I'm sure that's largely because you've gotten such excellent care from Cindy. And, you know, we have, most people being taken care of with disabilities in their homes, by their loved ones, by a spouse, by a daughter, by a son, by a parent, and if we were to add up what the cost of that care is every year, it would be over $300 billion.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT

So we've got to figure out how to support families like this and support caregivers like Cindy. And she, she talked about a bill that I passed called the Lifespan Respite Act because I knew that a lot of people are doing what Cindy does and they get no time off at all. You know, they don't have any overtime, they, they don't have any days off, it's a 24/7, 365-day a year labor of love and so under the Lifespan Respite Act, which I wrote and finally got passed, we're gonna be setting up some networks of care so that Cindy can get a few hours off so that, you know, she'll be able to get additional help from the community.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Because if Cindy stopped taking care of her husband, or if there were no Cindy in his life, then we would as the community be taking care of him at a much higher cost than what is being paid right now. So this is not only a wonderful act of love, it's a very big contribution to the rest of us that you're doing this. And I believe that part of national health care, universal health care has to be long-term care. This is gonna be a growing problem because we're living longer and the longer we live and the better our health care, the more we will live with chronic conditions.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

So, we're gonna have to figure out how to help take care of each other and that's got to be a part of any kind of health care plan. And I also think that the fact that you have Medicare is a lifesaver. The fact that you have private insurance is unusual. Not, not many people with, you know, severe disabilities cannot afford private insurance but even private insurance won't provide for all of the equipment, all of the prescriptions, all of the nursing care that you need. So we need a pool of money to help families with a severely ill person and, you know, most of the health care dollar goes to taking care of these very chronically ill people.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

So if we could figure out a better way to help you too, then we could actually cut the costs across the board because if people are in a setting where their needs are taken care of in a more cost effective way, we wouldn't be spending so much money in a disorganized way to take care of you. So, I think we can do a better job and we can be more cost effective, we can give Cindy help and we can help you live longer and enjoy experiences like this for many years to come.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) All right. (inaudible)

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

And thank you for being here.

ROBIN ROBERTS (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) Ross is it? Ross has a, has a question for you Senator.

ROSS (AUDIENCE MEMBER)

Good morning Senator Clinton. Family planning services for low-income women are nearly non-existing in this country. If you were elected president what would you do to help prevent unintended pregnancy as well as ensure access to available and affordable birth control for all women?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

Well I actually have legislation to do this because I do believe that abortion should be safe, legal and rare, and it cannot be rare if people are not educated to make responsible decisions and if they do not have access to family planning. And there's been a continuing cut back in funds for family planning over the last six years. So I would restore our commitment to help people have access to family planning. I think it's also unfair that insurance companies don't cover birth control pills and devices. They cover certain prescriptions for men but they don't cover prescriptions for women, which seems to me a little bit strange to be honest about it.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (DEMOCRAT)

So I, I think we need to end insurance discrimination against and have birth control, family planning included. And I have legislation called Prevention First because I do think we would be better off if we had more responsible decision-making, better education and better access to family planning.

ROB SIMMELKJAER (ABC NEWS)

(Off-camera) That was 'Good Morning America's' 'Town Hall' meeting with presidential candidate Hillary Clinton in Iowa. Thanks for watching ABC News Now.

FORMER GOV. TOM VILSACK DELIVERS REMARKS AT HILLARY CLINTON CAMPAIGN EVENT, 3/26/2007

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Thank you so much.

Well, I am absolutely thrilled and honored to have the endorsements of two people whom I admire so much.

As both Christie and Tom said, we have a personal relationship that goes back to Christie's brother Tom, who was one of my great friends and someone whom I miss on a regular basis. He could make you laugh. He could ask a piercing question. He could put you in your place.

And I also watched with great admiration the campaign and then the administration that Tom and Christie provided to this state.

You know, when Christie called and asked me to do a fund-raiser for her husband, who was running for governor and was way behind, I immediately said yes. I didn't know anything about the governor's race in Iowa other than we hoped a Democrat could win. But I was more than happy to help Tom and Christie.

And then when they came for the event and when I heard Tom speak, when I heard the passion that he brought to issues that I have worked on my entire life -- giving our kids a good start in life, making our schools work for all of our children, providing health care, incentivizing the economy to make sure that it provided good jobs and rising incomes to rural areas as well as urban ones.

I just walked away from that first encounter and hearing Tom Vilsack and I knew he was a winner. I remember going back to the White House and telling my husband, "I think I just heard the next governor of Iowa."

And I have told Tom and I've told a lot of people in the years since, when I came out right before the election, Tom Vilsack gave one of the best political speeches I've heard from anybody in our country.

CLINTON: Some of you might have been there. He held up a Big Chief tablet in one hand and a laptop computer in the other. And he basically said we have to modernize education in Iowa.

Now, I grew up next door in Illinois, and I know that for generations Iowa schools were ranked high; Iowa students performed above the national average. But Tom Vilsack knew that the education system in Iowa, like the rest of our country, needed to be pushed toward the future.

And the work that he has done, with Christie by his side, is really admired throughout our nation.

I want to pay special tribute to Christie when it comes to the work she's done on literacy and on behalf of libraries and early childhood learning.

(APPLAUSE)

She brings, you know, the experience of a certified teacher and the passion of a missionary, because she knows what it takes to help prepare all of our kids and how we can't just walk away from our obligations to each individual, but also our obligations to each other as to whether we're going to have an economy that will include everybody to be competitive and have a good standard of living.

And I really appreciate Tom's leadership when it came to preschool education. You know, a lot of people say, "Well, that's a nice thing to do." But Tom Vilsack did it, and created a program that is reaching more and more kids in Iowa.

And you know, the Federal Reserve Board in Minneapolis just did a study, and they asked themselves this question: What one thing could America do that would make us more competitive globally? And the answer came back: preschool education.

And Tom Vilsack was ahead on that.

He was also ahead in getting a much higher percentage of the children of Iowa enrolled in a State Children's Health Insurance Program, something that I worked on during the White House and was proud to see the Congress pass it, but a lot of states didn't really go at it the way that Iowa did under Governor Vilsack. And I commend him for the progress he made and the fact that so many children in Iowa have coverage.

There's still a gap. We still have to do more. But thank goodness for everything he did.

And when it comes to the economy and particularly the agricultural economy, Tom Vilsack knew early on that we needed to move toward homegrown fuel, American-owned fuel.

And he has made that a cause that he's taken across our country.

So there is much that I admire in the record that Tom Vilsack and Christie Vilsack have compiled here in Iowa, and I am extremely grateful to have their endorsements.

But this presidential campaign that Tom ran has also made a strong impression.

CLINTON: You know, he stood up for veterans' health. He stood up for it even before we found out what was going on at Walter Reed. He knew that we had to do better by those who had served us. And I will carry that cause on in this campaign with Tom by my side.

He stood up for ending the war in Iraq the right way, for telling the president: You're on the wrong course. And he spoke about that across this country.

And I'm not sure, Tom, we're going to be able to change the president's mind. We're sure trying.

(LAUGHTER)

T. VILSACK: Good luck.

CLINTON: Yes, good luck is right.

But I can tell you this. If the president still has us mired in Iraq when he leaves office, which I believe would be one of the most irresponsible positions any American president has ever taken -- this has been his war, he started it, he waged it preemptively, he mismanaged it, it is his responsibility to extricate us from Iraq.

But if he doesn't, Tom Vilsack and I will campaign together around this country and make it clear that when I'm president we will end the war in Iraq and begin to bring our troops home.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, every day that goes by I learn more about Iowa and about the caucuses. And one of the things that I've learned is that this is a really personal undertaking.

You know, I want to do this the Iowa way. That means I want to be in living rooms and church basements and union halls and businesses and everywhere people gather to talk about my campaign and what my goals are for America.

Because I think it's time we start goals again as Americans. You know, standing in front of this school brings back a flood of memories to me. And I remember, when I was that age, feeling that I didn't just have my family on my side, I had my country on my side. I had the belief that my country was rooting for me.

I've told this story a million times, but after Sputnik went up, when the Russians sent that spy satellite up, my fifth-grade teacher came in and said, "Children, the president wants you to learn math and science."

And I believed that President Eisenhower had called Mrs. Krause (ph) and told her to come tell us that.

(LAUGHTER)

And, you know, when we used to get rounded up and taken into the gym to do our physical fitness tests, and then we got a certificate from the president, I thought President Kennedy signed those personally.

(AUDIO GAP)

CLINTON: We're tired of the fatalism, the pessimism that has infected Washington.

CLINTON: We're ready to roll up our sleeves and get to work, and you can see the results of the work that Tom and Christie Vilsack have done in Iowa, and we're going to make sure that America knows that what happens here can happen anywhere.

Thank you all very, very much for being here.

(APPLAUSE)

And I know a lot of friends of Tom and Christie's have come out, and I'd love to say hello to them and I don't know whether -- if we have time for questions, and maybe we can answer some questions from the press before we say hello to everybody who is gathered here.

Anybody have questions for any of us?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

(LAUGHTER)

VILSACK: I've had profound respect for Senator Clinton for so many years.

You know, it's about agreeing on the critical issues.

Senator Clinton understands that President Bush has mismanaged the war and wants to end it. Senator Clinton understands the necessity of improving education in this country so that our youngsters are equipped for the challenges of the 21st century. She has been committed throughout her public service to universal health care for all Americans that's affordable and quality.

And I have been very impressed with her work in energy, and particularly impressed with her work in rural areas in Upstate New York that leads me to believe that this is a message that we can carry across the country in every corner of the country, in every corner of this state, to convince people that it is time for Senator Clinton to assume the responsibility of being the next president.

It was an easy transition; it wasn't even a question. This is the person to be the next president of the United States. She is tried, she is tested, and she is ready.

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: What are your feelings about agreeing on key positions? Will you abandon those differences that you have on Iraq that you've expressed?

VILSACK: You know, the reality is that we need to look forward in terms of Iraq. I think Senator Clinton and I both agree that the president has made serious mistakes and has the responsibility to correct those mistakes.

VILSACK: If he refuses to do so and fails to do so, which appears to be his course, then it will be up to the next president of the United States to correct that situation.

Senator Clinton has assured all of us that it is her intent to end this war, if it's not ended before she becomes president. I know that she will do that. I know that she has the capacity and the capability and the talent to do that.

And I also know that, while she's doing that, she can repair America's damaged reputation and image around the world. It's going to be necessary for the next president to do a lot of hand-holding and a lot of conversation and discussion to repair those relationships that have been frayed.

It is important to our security, our national security, that America resume its rightful place as a world leader.

This administration has walked away from its responsibilities. That's one thing that Hillary Clinton will never do.

And finally, these youngsters here deserve an American government that makes good on the American bargain, so that, as they grow up, they're going to be prepared to accept the challenges of the 21st century, to be able to effectively compete in a very, very tough economy, and to be able to have the peace of mind, to have their parents have the peace of mind that they and their parents have access to quality health care.

And finally, if we're going to be secure as a nation, both economically and from a national security standpoint, we have got to be energy secure. And I don't think anybody in this race understands that any better than Senator Clinton.

CLINTON: We have a young woman right here with a question.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, do you believe in the power of prayer?

CLINTON: Yes, I do.

You know, she asked me if I believe in the power of prayer, and I have said many times that I, fortunately, was raised by parents who believe in the power of prayer. So I was taught to pray and encouraged to pray every day.

If I had not been a praying person when I got to the White House, after having been there a short period of time, I would have become one, I can guarantee you.

(LAUGHTER)

Thank you all very, very much.

(APPLAUSE)

END

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON DELIVERS REMARKS AT THE COMMUNICATIONS WORKERS OF AMERICA LEGISLATIVE POLITICAL CONFERENCE, 3/27/2007

CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you so much.

(APPLAUSE)

Woah. Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

My goodness. Thanks so much. And it is great to be here with all of you. I thank Barbara for that introduction. She is a friend of mine. She's been a friend of mine for a long time. And she's a great leader, not only for CWA, but for women in the labor movement across America.

(APPLAUSE)

I also want to thank Jeff. Thanks for ceding your place to Barbara, Jeff.

(LAUGHTER)

And I did whisper to Barbara -- Barbara was the best-looking member of the executive board.

(APPLAUSE)

But, Jeff, I know that you've done a lot to keep people in good spirits here this morning. And I appreciate that because, you know, we're on the march. Let's be in a good humor. We're taking back our country.

(APPLAUSE)

We're going to get back to supporting the right values in America.

(APPLAUSE)

And, of course, I'm delighted to be here with your president. Larry Cohen is a fabulous advocate not only for your union, but he understands that we've got to make linkages between what labor needs and wants and whether we're going to have a middle class in America with rising incomes and a good standard of living.

And Larry also understands that we've got to start reaching out to workers around the world. You know, we have to have a global labor movement. We need a...

(APPLAUSE)

... a new commitment to making it clear that we have nothing against people around the world raising their standard of living; we just don't want them doing it at our expense.

CLINTON: We want to help people have a better life for the future, just like we had to have it right here at home.

(APPLAUSE)

Also, I was escorted in by some of the New Yorkers. And I want to thank Chris Shelton, the president of the regional CWA in the northeast; and of course Bob Master, political director from the northeast region; and all the local presidents and leaders from New York.

I've been on picket lines with you. I've tried to advocate for you. And I'm thrilled to be here with all of you today.

(APPLAUSE)

One final person I want to thank, because our offices work really closely together on a daily basis, and that's Lou Gerber, your legislative director, because Lou makes it clear...

(APPLAUSE)

... Lou, Lou, Lou!

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

Lou makes it clear what's at stake in these struggles that we're engaged in.

I just came from the Senate hearing that was chaired by a great champion of American middle class and working families, Senator Ted Kennedy. We just had the hearing on the Employee Free Choice Act.

(APPLAUSE)

And, you know, the facts are indisputable. There's no debate here. It's just whether we can get the votes in the Senate to get it passed.

And that's going to be up to all of you. Those of you from states with Republican senators, let them know this is a voting issue; this goes to the real heart of whether we're going to be a country that stands on a principle that every person should have the right to join a union, to be part of a bargaining unit that will stand up for your income...

(APPLAUSE)

... stand up for your working conditions, stand up for your health care benefits and your pensions.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, in a very real way, all of you have made it possible for us to be connected in the world.

CLINTON: You know, I'm really well aware of that. You know, a student in Washington today can instant message with a student all the way around the world in Tokyo. You know, someone can send a real-time e-mail on a cell phone or, you know, be able to communicate, and that's because you've done this work for decades now. You know, you were the ones who put into action all the great ideas.

The ideas would have stayed on a shelf somewhere if people weren't there to actually implement them.

And I remember very, very well -- in the days after 9/11, when we were struggling to make sense of this horrific attack on us, you know, it was so overwhelming. And those of you from New York remember, you know, the confusion and the anxiety that we lived with.

CWA workers started reconnecting lower Manhattan. CWA workers...

(APPLAUSE)

CWA workers came down to Ground Zero; said, "How can we help?" You know, the switching station had been destroyed, phones were out, land lines were gone and cell phones didn't work. The stock exchange was down.

And it was CWA workers who came down and started to get us back in touch with the rest of the country and the world.

I can remember it like it was yesterday, seeing our workers from New York hauling cable, working on wires, digging into the ground, doing what had to be done to get our city going again.

And isn't it somewhat ironic that, when we all agreed that we needed to get the stock exchange up and going to send a message to those who had attacked us -- you know: "Forget about it; you're not stopping us at all; we're going forward" -- that it was union workers who made that happen?

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: And yet it seems to me that a lot of our corporate leadership today just doesn't understand that. You know, corporate profits are up, CEO pay is up, but average wages of Americans are flat.

You know, we see this and we're asking ourselves, "What does this mean" -- what's called this middle-class squeeze?

Well, I'll tell you what it means. It means that the balance of power that's worked so well through the 20th century in America, where we had fair labor laws that were enforced fairly -- and it was only after a struggle that we even got those laws -- are being disregarded wholesale, because there is a mood in unfortunately too many corporate board rooms that we don't have to take care of the people who take care of us. No, we don't have to do our duty to America, because that's what this is at bottom about.

And we're going to continue to be the greatest country in the world?

I think we are. But we're only going to get there with a fight to re-establish the basic principles and values about what made America great -- because you can find rich people anywhere in the world, and unfortunately you can find poor people anywhere in the world.

What is unique about America is all of you; all of us. I come from a middle-class family in the middle of the country. And I know very well that the rising standard of living that we saw during much of the 20th century was due to the American labor movement.

I know that it was the American labor movement that first bargained for health care that then spread that concept throughout America. It was the American labor movement that first bargained for pensions, and then all of a sudden people took advantage of that.

Now we're down to 7 percent unionized workforce in the private sector. And is it any surprise that wages are flat; that people are harassed if they try to sign a card to start a union?

We're going to get back to the right balance here in America. We started with...

(APPLAUSE)

We started with electing a Democratic Congress, thanks to you and many of you who worked across our country to reverse the 12 years of Republican majorities.

(APPLAUSE)

And now we've got to work to elect a Democratic president so that in January 2009, we can begin to put our country on the right track to the future.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, for six long years, America's middle class and working families have been invisible to this president. He's looked right through you.

If you're a worker who can't organize for better wages and a safer workplace, you're invisible. If you're a family that can't get by on the minimum wage that hasn't been raised for 10 years, you're invisible. If you're a working person who doesn't have health care and you're one of the 47 million without insurance in the richest and greatest country in the world, you're invisible.

If you're a senior who's paid for long-term care, but then when you really need it and you produce your insurance policy, the insurance policy says, "Oh, just kidding"; you're invisible.

CLINTON: If you're one of those parents who's been saving money to be able to send your child to college and then all of a sudden you realize how much it's going to cost and you turn to get some help from your government and you realize that the aid hasn't been increased and there's no real recognition of how much more expensive it is today than it used to be, you're invisible too.

Well, you're not invisible to us. You're not invisible to this union, and you're sure not invisible to me.

And when I'm president, you'll have a president...

(APPLAUSE)

... who makes clear you're not invisible to her either.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, I'm running for president because I want to renew the basic bargain of America. You know the bargain. We were all raised with it: You work hard, you play by the rules, you get a better shot at life -- and your kids sure do. And you've got a government that's on your side; a government that sets goals for America and then encourages all of us to be part of reaching them.

That's how I was raised. You know, I'm old enough to remember that, you know, back in the late 1950s, the Russians sent a satellite up into the sky; they called it Sputnik. Anybody old enough to remember that?

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

Well, that was a big deal, you know, because we never expected any country to get to space before us. We were Americans; we'd just won a world war. You know, we were, under President Truman's leadership, starting to rebuild our enemies -- an amazing idea, but one that was very smart, because it helped to create democracy and, you know, keep our prosperity going.

So this satellite goes up in the air and, God, because my father was worried about it, everybody's worried about it -- I can remember like it was yesterday. My fifth grade teacher walked into my classroom and she said, "Children, the president wants you to learn math and science."

Now, I was convinced that President Eisenhower had personally called Mrs. Kraus (ph) and told her...

(LAUGHTER)

... to tell us that. And I wasn't too happy about it, because math and science were not exactly my best subjects. But I believed that that was possible, because I felt like my president would sit in the Oval Office thinking about me and every other kid in America.

That's what we believed then.

And, you know, when we were all rounded up and taken in the gym and we had to jump and run and do all kinds of physical activities, it was because the president had said we had to be physically active and fit.

And when I got that certificate signed by President Kennedy, I thought he was sitting there in the White House and said, "OK, Hillary's the next one; just sign it."

(LAUGHTER)

I mean, that's what we believed. We didn't think it was beyond the realm of possibility that we would have a president who actually worried about whether we were doing our homework and being physically fit.

And when President Johnson looked into that camera and said we were going to overcome and have voting rights, we knew it was going to happen that we were going to start breaking down those barriers so that every American could participate.

CLINTON: We used to set goals as a country. We believed in ourselves, you know. And when President Kennedy said we were going to send a man to the moon and bring him back in a decade, I didn't know how that was going to happen, but I never doubted it would.

What are the goals we're setting for our country now? Those of us who in New York personally lived through 9/11 and our whole country that rallied to our aid and was there for us when we needed you, we were waiting for the president to seize the moment, you know, to say, "Let's take this time and, you know, let's become energy independent so we're not sending money to people who fund those who then turn around and attack us."

(APPLAUSE)

Or maybe he would have said, "You know, I've learned a lot from what happened on 9/11. When those towers went down, all the medical insurance forms were lost. We didn't know who had insurance and who didn't. So we had to rush in with emergency Medicaid to sign people up."

And then we started hearing about the World Trade Center cough, and all these people were getting sick. And we had people, you know, we had guys who could run a marathon before 9/11 who can't walk up stairs now, they can't breathe. Some of them are dying. And, you know, maybe the president would have said, "Now's the time to move toward universal health care coverage." But we didn't hear that either.

(APPLAUSE)

So one of the reasons I'm running for president is set some goals again. I want to have universal health care coverage, quality, affordable health care for every single American.

(APPLAUSE)

I want to have an energy policy that makes us independent from those foreign regimes as soon as we can. It'll take a while, but if we get started now we can do it. I want to start having home-grown energy so that we're looking to employ people right here in America to build the new plants and run those new plants and distribute that new energy.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: I want to begin to figure out how we're going to make college affordable for everybody again. I don't think it should be the province of the wealthy. It never was before.

Let's get back to providing the aid, the scholarships, the low- interest loans that people need to send their kids to college.

(APPLAUSE)

And I want to get back to a level playing field for the right to organize. I think it's a novel idea, but I would appoint people to the Department of Labor and the NLRB who actually were pro-labor for a change.

(APPLAUSE)

And I know what's going on right now. I saw those handouts that those of you who work at Verizon Business have been given. I saw the intimidation and the threats. I saw the false statements that they contain.

And as Barbara said, Senator Schumer and I sent a letter to the CEO of Verizon telling him that he should recognize your right to organize through Card-Check.

(APPLAUSE)

And I want you to know that I will stand with you every step of the way until you get that right. It should be the right of every single employee of every company in America.

(APPLAUSE)

We have a lot of work to do, and I'm going to look to you to be my partner. You know, we need a comprehensive national broadband policy. And I think we can use your "Speed Matters" as a road map.

You know, we need to get...

(APPLAUSE)

We need to get back on the global list of being number one.

You know, back in 2000, we were number one in the world in broadband. Now we're down to 12th or 14th or 15th, whatever the survey you look to; 16th. We're dropping by the minute; 20th.

(LAUGHTER)

AUDIENCE MEMBER: Twenty-one.

CLINTON: Twenty-one. Jeff's read an auction up here.

(CROSSTALK)

CLINTON: You know, but basically, I just want us to be Americans again. I want us to roll up our sleeves and get back into the solution business; you know, solving the problems we face, not avoiding them, not denying them.

CLINTON: I want us to get back where people are respecting each other. We may have differences. We're going to have differences. We're Americans, you know, (inaudible) 300 million people, we probably have 300 million opinions about nearly every subject. I certainly know, representing New York, I have 19 million opinions about every subject.

(LAUGHTER)

But let's look for some win-win strategies. You know, when it comes to trade policy, we can't keep doing what we've been doing. You know, on balance trade was good for America in the 20th century, but today the situation has changed. You know, we shouldn't have any trade agreements if they don't have enforceable labor and environmental standards, and we need to figure out how to do that.

(APPLAUSE)

We need to take every one of the problems we've got. You know, climate change, some people are worried about climate change. Great Britain, they went into Kyoto when President Bush pulled us out, and they've now created over 100,000 new jobs. People are doing pollution control. People who are weathering houses. People who are making new technology that can be used.

You know, we're not gaining ground the way we need to by ignoring our problems. If we're going to remain the leader of the world, we got to start acting like it again.

And as president, I'll tell you, one thing I will do as soon as I'm elected is to send a message as loudly as I can to the rest of the world: I will always protect and defend America's interests, but I know we need to build alliances and coalitions because we can't solve these problems on our own.

If we're going to deal with...

(APPLAUSE)

... we're going to deal with the threat from terrorism and extremism, we got to have people on our side. We got to have the folks who know the bomb-maker down the street and turn him in. We got to have people who are rooting for America because we are the last best hope of humanity.

We got to get people back understanding that our values really should be everybody's values. You know, we believe in the opportunity for people to have freedom to make up their own mind.

It's like card check, you know. You ask somebody, "You want to join the union?" they say no, fine. More often they'll say yes. We want to give people that freedom across the globe.

So we have a lot of work to do. But I'm excited because I see it turning. I see people starting to say to themselves, "What have we gotten for all the rhetoric, all the partisanship, you know, all of the hot issues that don't give us a job or a pension or health care? What have we gotten?"

Because, you know, our country worked pretty well for a long time. And many of us are the result of what came before, people who made the sacrifice in our own families, in our own neighborhoods, the schools we went to, the unions, the jobs that were there.

I'm proud of our country. Always have been, always will. But I know we can do better. And with your help, on January 20th, 2009, when I'm sworn in as president and I inherit all these big holes that have been dug over the last eight years, and all the problems that have piled up, I'm going to hand everybody in America a shovel...

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: ... and we're going to start digging our way out.

And then I'm going to turn to Larry and the CWA. I'm going to say, "Connect us up, because America's on the march again and we're going to show the world we are back!"

Thank you, and God bless you!

(APPLAUSE)

(UNKNOWN): That was a home run.

CLINTON: Oh, thank you so much.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you. (inaudible) so I'm happy I could get through it.

(APPLAUSE)

Thanks, Jeff. Thank you so much.

(APPLAUSE)

AFL-CIO BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES DEPARTMENT 2007 LEGISLATIVE CONFERENCE, 3/28/2007

CLINTON: (Applause.) Good morning. It is great to be here with all of you, the people who actually build America and keep it going. And I want to thank you for the work you do every single day.

But more than that, I want to thank you for representing what is best about America. America is a land of builders and doers, and we've got to get back to rolling up our sleeves and getting the job done, and there's no people better able to do it than all of you. And thank you for that. (Applause.) I want to thank Ed Sullivan for that introduction, but more than that, for his years of work and leadership. He's been a bedrock of the labor movement. And don't let that kind and gentle manner fool you -- when it comes to the issues that matter the most, Ed is a fighter. I've seen it, you've seen it, and we're grateful, Ed, that you have that fighting spirit and your leadership has meant so much to working people. Thank you. (Applause.) I also want to recognize Sean McGarvey and Rod Bennett (ph), and the team that you have here in Washington. We work closely with you throughout the year. And there's a lot of work now to be done because, thanks to the help that many of you have given us, we, finally, after 12 long years, have a Democratic majority again in the United States Congress. (Applause.) And that means that we can start being serious about issues that matter. Yesterday I was in a hearing chaired by Senator Kennedy about the Employee Free Choice Act. We passed it through the House and we're going to pass it through the Senate with your help and your enthusiastic backing. (Applause.) Now there may be some people who will watch these proceedings on C-SPAN and they'll say, "Well, what's the Employee Free Choice Act?" "What does Card Check actually mean?" Well, you know what it means. There is hardly a square foot of America that doesn't have your fingerprints on it -- from the roads we drive on to the buildings we work in. And none of that would have been possible without your unions -- without your work and training and safety for your workforce. You get the job done and you get it done right the first time. (Applause.) I always tell people, if you want the safest, proudest, hardest-working, hardest-skilled workers, then there's just one place to look, and that is the union. And if we don't give people the chance to exercise their freedom of choice, we are undermining one of America's fundamental rights. So Employee Free Choice is about as American as apple pie. You get a chance to decide, without harassment and intimidation, that you want to be part of a union. And that's why this is important, not just to unions, but to every single American. (Applause.) But look, I know some people just don't get it. Our president, our friends here in Washington claim to share our values and support workers. But let's face it, they want to stamp out unions. They want to make them disappear. That has been their objective. And, in fact, when they see that union bug the first thing they do is call for the exterminator. (Laughter.) So I think we just have to lay it out for everybody. If you want to claim to be someone who believes in justice, fairness and the American dream -- someone who says you stand up for the American middle class -- if you think you truly are pro-worker, then you have to be pro-union. There is no contradiction. It's absolutely essential. (Applause.) You know, my friends from New York have heard me talk about this over and over. You know, the fact is we wouldn't have an American middle class without American unions. There is no other explanation because, you know, rich people you can find anywhere in the world -- and, unfortunately you can find poor people anywhere in the world. But it was America that, during the 20th Century, created this phenomenon known as the American middle class. It didn't happen by accident, it wasn't a gift, it was the result of a long struggle. And key to that struggle and our victory was the American labor movement. It has been the backbone of our democracy for generations. And yet today only 7 percent of our private sector workforce is unionized. Our middle class and hardworking families are under siege. All across America, we are seeing what happens when workers do not unionize. CEO pay is up, corporate profits are certainly up, and even productivity is up. That means people are working harder and harder. There are no harder-working people in the world than the American workers, and yet they are not being rewarded for their hard work. (Applause.) You can look across the country -- wages haven't kept up, incomes haven't kept up. But you know what has increased -- health care costs, college tuition, energy costs. And when incomes don't keep up, then people start falling behind. That's why there's this sense in our country, as I travel from one coast to the other -- that America's middle class, and these hard-working families that are really the core of who we are as a country, have become the invisible Americans. Our president has looked right through them. If you're a worker who can't organize for better wages and safer working conditions, you're invisible. If you're a soldier in Walter Reed struggling to get treatment from the country you served, you're invisible. If you're a mother without health care for yourself and your children, a father without a job, a family that can't get by on the minimum wage because we haven't raised it in 10 years, you're invisible too. Well, I want everybody in this country to know you're not invisible to us. You're not invisible to the labor movement. You're not invisible to me. And when we take back the White House in 2008, you will no longer be invisible to the president of the United States! (Cheers, applause.) You know, that's really at the core of why I'm running for president. I think it's time we again drew on the God-given potential of every American. It's time we leveled the playing field again -- we got back to that balance of power that used to exist between labor and management that made the union movement so successful. America is at our best when we come together and actually try to meet our toughest challenges. You know, think about our history -- you can go way back to the beginning of this country. You know, I like to think about building the Erie Canal in New York. About 200 years ago, a governor named Clinton decided to link up New York City with Buffalo and to build something that people said could never be built. Well, they turned out to be wrong. And the Erie Canal was one of the wonders of engineering -- and it opened up the West and it began the incredible rise of the American economy. During the Civil War, when we were fighting to keep our country together and the future was not at all certain, we finished the intercontinental railroad system. During the Depression -- we were electrifying our country, we were building projects to put people to work and give them some sense of dignity. And many of us still use those -- we go to auditoriums that were built during that time, we go to parks that were created during that time. During the 1950s, we had the interstate highway system. During the '60s we had the space program. That's when America is at its best -- when we set goals and we get about reaching them. What are our goals today? You know, we in New York were very grateful for the help that came to us after 9/11 from across the country. And we kept waiting for our president to summon us to something bigger than ourselves. Maybe he would have said, you know, "Let's make sure we have health care for everybody who was hurt in that disaster and those are going to be sickened and then let's make sure everybody does." Didn't hear that. "How about if we have a new energy plan that puts millions of Americans to work and moves us away from our dependence on foreign oil?" Didn't hear that. Well, how about making college affordable again for the children of hard-working Americans who are now finding it beyond their reach, no matter how much they've saved? Do you remember what the president asked us to do after 9/11? "Go shopping." (Laughter.) That was it. Go shopping. I mean, I had to listen to it a couple of times to believe it myself. (Laughter.) I mean, look, I like to shop as much as the next person. (Laughter.) But I don't think that's a national goal. I think we could do a lot better than that. I think we can come together again and say, "Look, our infrastructure is crumbling." In New York City, in many of the cities through the Northeast and the Midwest, we're still using tunnels and bridges and water systems that were built 100 years ago. In the fast-growing parts of our country, in the South and the West, we can't keep up with the need for water and other kinds of public improvements. We have an opportunity now to make it possible for us to put people to work and give you a chance once again to be part of building America. But to do that, we need a president who really believes in building America and is willing to invest the political capital and the financial resources to make that happen again. (Applause.) Well, when I'm president, we're going to start being bold again, bold and practical. I know we can do this. We've done it before. And I'm going to be looking to my friends in our unions to help us set that agenda. You know how we're going to start? We're going to end this administration's practice of harassing and bureaucratizing labor organizations, making them run through and jump through gauntlets and hoops. (Applause.) And here's a novel idea: We're actually going to appoint people to the Department of Labor and the NLRB who are actually pro-labor for a change. (Applause.) Next, we're going to stand up for Davis-Bacon, because our workers deserve fair wages and nothing less. Unfortunately, when it comes to Davis-Bacon, once again, our president just doesn't get it. Remember what he did after Hurricane Katrina? Just when people had been hit hard by a massive natural disaster and they were looking for work -- they wanted to stay home or come back home if they could get a good job -- why on earth would you repeal the law that makes it possible for them to get fair wages? Now, we stood together in the Congress and forced that to be reversed. It never should have happened in the first place. The way I see it -- (applause) -- this is not a Democratic or a Republican issue. It's a fundamental workers' rights issue. It's not about what you should or shouldn't pay. It's about setting a standard so that Washington doesn't undermine your local wage standards. And once we get that enacted, we're going to start by putting an end to the battles you have to wage every single year to get Davis-Bacon applied to federally-funded infrastructure projects. That's getting a little old. We need to end that debate once and for all and make sure -- (applause) -- we're going to make sure Davis-Bacon will apply to all federally assisted construction projects. I've worked with my friends in New York to make that happen on a number of projects -- on military bases and other federally funded projects. We're not going to have these fights anymore. The law is the law, and we're going to enforce it. And when it comes to enforcing Davis-Bacon, right now workers across America are underpaid because too many of the wage determinations under the act are inaccurate and out of date. But the Bush administration has slashed the staff of the Wage and Enforcement Division of the Department of Labor. Well, we're not going to stand for that either. We're going to fight to get the Labor Department the funding it needs to correct and update every wage determination in America so that our workers get paid what they deserve. (Applause.) And let me also say a word about those contractors who think they can get away with violating Davis-Bacon, underpaying the workers, and not get caught. It's disgraceful, it's dishonorable and it's un-American. And if this administration is unwilling to enforce our wage and labor laws, then we need to give you the power to do that. And that's why today, with my good friend, Congressman Rob Andrews of New Jersey, I'm sponsoring legislation to give you meaningful access to contractor payroll records so we will know exactly who's shirking the laws. (Applause.) You know, we're going to put in place laws with teeth and we're going to empower people to get those laws enforced. It is also time for comprehensive immigration reform, reform that includes harsh penalties for employers who skirt our laws and exploit undocumented workers. (Applause.) And we absolutely cannot accept any new guest worker programs without the strongest possible labor protections, and no exceptions whatsoever. (Applause.) It's also past time that we take a strong stance on misclassifying workers as independent contractors -- (applause) -- another way employers exploit undocumented workers. (Applause.) Now, we all know what employers are doing here.

They're trying to drive their workers beyond the reach of our most basic worker protections. And, you know, that's often led to tragic results. We've had some horrible accidents in New York where contractors didn't follow the rules, where undocumented workers were not trained or supervised, and it's led to the deaths of some of those workers. A lot of these employers are trying to avoid providing basic benefits like Social Security and overtime, workers' comp and more. This undermines the upstanding employers who play by the rules. I thought America was about playing by the rules -- no advantage to the privileged; everybody has to be on the same field, playing by the same rules. And it does deprive workers of their most basic rights and benefits. Look, let's just call it what it is. It is cheating, plain and simple, and we're going to put an end to it when we get back into the White House. (Applause.) I've also spoken to a number of you about how we need new thinking on trade policy. Now, that means trade agreements with strong protections for workers and the environment. And we shouldn't pass fast track. I voted against fast track in 2002. And until we see a wholesale change in our national policy toward trade, I will vote against fast track again when it comes up for renewal this June. (Applause.) You know, on balance, trade has been good for our country in the 20th century. But the environment has changed. You know, we're competing against countries that don't have the same laws, don't even have the same attitudes that we do. So it's time for a new approach. It's also time for a new approach to climate change. We know we've got to deal with global warming. We're seeing the effects of it. You know, diseases are moving north from the Tropics that we never saw before, not just plant diseases and animal diseases, but human diseases. We're seeing more intense storms. We know we have to reduce our greenhouse gas emissions, but we've got to do it in a way that builds up our energy infrastructure and puts millions of people to work. We need to invest in clean energy technology today so that we can create new high-paying jobs to protect our environment, to grow our economy and to finally break our addiction to foreign oil. I think this can be a win-win and I look forward to working with you to make it so. And we know we can create new jobs by finally making those investments in infrastructure. We need to have 21st century jobs in a 21st century economy that is built upon a 21st century infrastructure. We can't continue to live off the investments and the hard work of previous generations. It is time for this generation to stand up and say, "We're going to build America and our government is behind us." That also means we need bold leadership on project labor agreements. You may recall that one of the first things -- (applause) -- that the first President Bush did was to ban PLAs from federal contractors. Then President Clinton rescinded the ban. Then when the second President Bush took office, one of the first things he did was put the ban on PLAs back in place. Well, again, let me be very clear: I will again promote PLAs on construction projects in this country because we know that's the right decision for our workers and our contractors. (Applause.) You know, in the end, everything I've talked about today comes down to one simple principle: In our country, we should stand with those who stand for us -- not for CEOs who pick up their headquarters and move them to Dubai -- (boos) -- not for people who make record profits and just can't figure out how to share those with their employees; not for those on the political scene who are great at the rhetoric, but when it comes time to produce you can't find them. We need to stand with those who stand for what America stands for. That's exactly what all of you do everyday -- not just in building in the infrastructure that keeps America going, but in your service to those in need. I know about your Job Corps programs to give young people in need the opportunity to live up to their dreams. I know about your Helmets-to-Hardhats program to honor the brave men and women who served our country and make sure they're not forgotten when they come home. I know what you're doing along the Gulf Coast to help those whose lives were turned upside down by Hurricane Katrina. We have more than 90,000 people still living in trailers. You all could have built twice that many houses in the time that it's taken to put those people in trailers and to leave them there without any help. (Applause.) I know how, after you heard the heartbreaking stories about our soldiers at Walter Reed, many of you stepped forward and said, "How can we help? We'll do it for free. We'll do whatever it takes to make it right." And I am very grateful to you. And finally, I know what you did on September the 11th -- so many of you were the quiet heroes of that day. You were the second responders in New York City and Long Island and Westchester and Jersey and Connecticut. People dropped whatever they were doing and literally raced to Ground Zero. And now many of those people who responded for us are sick. It started with the World Trade Center cough, and now it's advanced for many people so that they can barely breathe. You know, guys who could lift 300 pounds can barely walk upstairs. I am committed to doing whatever I can to make sure that everyone gets the health care that they need. And that is why working with you, I plan to create a national database of second responders -- those who were willing to pitch in when the crisis struck. And we'll know who to call the next time we need help, whether it's a natural disaster or some kind of terrorist attack, because when this country has needed you, you've never let us down -- no hesitation, no questions asked. So to those who somehow try to paint unions as un-American, as somewhat less than patriotic, I say to them, come see what I've seen. Come meet the people I've met. Come and open your eyes to what the building trades are doing. It's the height of patriotism because they know what America really stands for. We've had a tough couple of years, but the spirit of our country is strong and the spirit of your unions is as well. And working together, that is the spirit we're going to bring back to the White House. It's time that we held out our arms to every single American and said, you know what? If you work hard and you play by the rules, there'll be a place for you. We want you to live up to your God-given potential. We want you to believe again in yourselves and in our country. There is no problem we can't solve. There is no challenge we cannot meet. There are no obstacles we cannot overcome. If we just roll up our sleeves and get to work again, we'll be able to prove that to ourselves and the rest of the world. And if you give me the great honor to serve as your president, I promise you -- we will restore that spirit. We will renew the promise of this great nation. And when I meet with you on that short drive from the White House in 2009, we will be able to say, America is back. We're on the right track. We're going to show the world that we're not willing to sit back and cede the future to anybody. And that's because we have the best people, the hardest working workers in the entire world! Thank you all and God bless you! (Applause.)

GOV. JON CORZINE DELIVERS REMARKS AT HILLARY CLINTON CAMPAIGN EVENT, 4/2/2007

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Whoa, thank you all -- my goodness. Thank you, thank you, thank you.

This is a totally wonderful moment in time for me because, as all the people who are behind me and many of you in front of me know, I am thrilled to have the endorsement and the support of so many elected officials and leaders from New Jersey.

I have spent a lot of time here. I look forward to spending more. And it gives me, just, such a great sense of momentum and energy to have this support from New Jersey and South Jersey, from the legislature, from members of Congress, from the clergy, so many others who are here today.

I want to thank the state party chair, Joe Cryan. Joe, you're doing a great job, and you're leading the New Jersey Democrats to a new level.

(APPLAUSE)

Mayor, I'm delighted to be here in your city. Elizabeth is a historic city, and you're making it not only a city of historic past but a great future.

(APPLAUSE)

I want to thank my good friend, Bonnie Watson Coleman. She knows a little bit about breaking barriers for women, because she's been doing it all of her life.

(APPLAUSE)

And, Bonnie, I'm so proud to have your friendship and your support.

(APPLAUSE)

And to the speaker, Joe Roberts: Joe, you'll not only be on the Christmas card list; you can come and visit from time to time.

(LAUGHTER)

I love those reasons.

You know, I am going to also recognize a few other people who are here because I want to just mention them before I get back to my friend and your great governor.

I want to thank Representative Rob Andrews and Representative Frank Pallone, who are here.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: I work with both Rob and Frank. Frank has a very important position in the Congress now, where he's actually chairing one of the committees that is going to work with me when I'm president to make sure we get quality, affordable health care for every single person in New Jersey, New York and America.

(APPLAUSE)

And Rob Andrews and I have worked together on important issues, particularly as they affect working people. It is time that we, once again, put our priorities straight in America and make it clear that we're going to provide good jobs with rising incomes to the vast majority of Americans. It is the middle class and working families that built this country and Rob understands that and is fighting with me for that.

(APPLAUSE)

And to State Senator Lesniak, I think we're in your district, and I so appreciate your support and your enthusiasm with this endorsement. And to Joe DeVincenzo, thank you so much for your leadership.

(APPLAUSE)

To Senator Buono, thank you, Barbara, being here.

Reverend Jackson, Reverend Simmons and everybody behind me -- let's give all of these leaders of New Jersey a great round of applause.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, I am thrilled to have anybody's endorsement, obviously. This is a long race, and we're putting together a great campaign. But I am especially honored and thrilled to have Jon Corzine's, because Jon and I have worked together.

You know, it is one thing to look at somebody from afar and follow that person in the news and maybe, you know, read about what he or she does. But when you work with somebody as closely as Jon and I work together in the Senate, you know you really do build a bond and a friendship.

Now, we would be friends because of that shared service, but we really became close because of what we went through after 9/11.

CLINTON: You know, Jon and I did sit near each other. I was slightly ahead of him in seniority, which I never let him forget.

We sat together in the back row of the Senate, where they put all the new people who come. It doesn't matter if you were the chairman of Goldman Sachs or the first lady of the country. You're back there, you know, just in line behind everybody else.

But we did have a good seat. We were near the candy drawer.

(LAUGHTER)

And so, when times got tough, we could, kind of, go and, you know, pull a little treat out of that drawer.

But we, seriously, went through a lot together. You know, when 9/11 hit, the whole country was, of course, sympathetic and rallied to our cause.

But Jon and I lived it every single day. You know, we were there for the people who lost their loved ones, you know, the family members who had said goodbye to their husband or their wife that morning or had just talked to their son or their daughter, and never got a chance to say goodbye and never really understood how this could have happened in America.

We were there for the people who lost their jobs and their livelihoods, you know. And we had to work on getting an agenda passed that would, number one, try to find out what happened.

You know, the 9/11 Commission did not easily pass the Congress because the White House was against it. They didn't want to explore what went wrong.

But Jon and I wouldn't give up. And thanks to that effort, we did get a commission, a bipartisan commission that was really straightforward in saying, here's what you did wrong and here's what you need to do, going forward.

And then Jon and I worked together to try to get those recommendations passed. You know, we sat together on one of the committees where I was proud to support Jon's legislation to make our chemical industry more secure. And boy, does New Jersey and New York have a big stake in whether we get that right.

And Jon pushed that legislation. He was the spokesman in the Congress. And we kept running into brick walls.

Well, finally, all these years later, we've got something passed and we finally got an agreement from the administration to do what Jon Corzine has been saying all along: Let's do it right, but let's give states like New Jersey the power to do even more.

CLINTON: And that never would have happened without Governor Corzine's leadership, and I am so grateful to him.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, Jon was there every step of the way after Enron. He put his expertise to work in trying to prevent this from happening to other people, where companies just basically pull the rug out from employees and stockholders and everybody else because they lie, they cheat, they steal.

And Jon Corzine was one of the major players in getting legislation passed to try to protect us going forward. Everybody who works for any company, anybody who has stock in any company, you owe Jon Corzine a big thanks because he was there to make sure that we're going to try to have a better system going forward.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, just a few weeks ago, Jon appeared before the committee we used to serve on together. It's called the Environment and Public Works Committee. And Jon was there to talk about how important it is for a coastal state like New Jersey, or New York, to start dealing with global climate change.

You know, it is happening. It is not some abstract problem or only affecting, you know, polar bears on ice floes. It is happening. We are seeing stronger and more frequent storms. We're seeing all kinds of changes in climate and vegetation and diseases are moving north. And so your governor was there to tell the Congress to do the right thing. And he talked about what he's doing, along with the legislature and country executives and municipal leaders like the mayor, to begin to deal with this threat.

Well today, Jon, we had a big victory because the United States Supreme Court said, "Guess what? Carbon dioxide should be regulated. It should be regulated because it's a pollutant, and we should start dealing with global climate change."

(APPLAUSE)

So Jon has been on the forefront of so many of the big issues that affect New Jersey and affect this region and affect the country. And I'm running for president because I want to get back to setting goals for our country.

And I'm old enough to remember when we had presidents who set goals. You know, I can remember President Kennedy saying we were going to send a man to the moon and bring him back safely in a decade. I didn't know how that was going to happen. I never doubted we'd do it, because that's what we did. We were Americans. We solved problems. We rolled up our sleeves. We took on the toughest challenges.

Well, what are our goals today? You know, if your grandchild or your child asks you, "Well, what is America trying to do today," what's our answer? We need to get back to the America that we all grew up in, that we were so proud of. We need to set the goal of universal health care coverage. Let's make health care affordable and available to every single American.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: We need to set the goal of energy independence. We can do this. Don't listen to the naysayers in Washington. Listen to your governor. Listen to me. Listen to those who say, "Not only do we have to move toward energy independence, we have no choice. We cannot be dependent on unstable areas of the world, and they take our money which we use to buy their oil and then they use it against us."

You know, this is for our security. We cannot wait.

(APPLAUSE)

We also need to do it because it's going to be good for the environment. And, equally important, we will create millions of new, good-paying jobs for people here in Jersey and New York, across the country. Because when we put people to work with new, green, renewable alternative energy, with cleaning up the environment, those will be good-paying jobs.

So we need to set these goals and then we need to reach them. When it comes to education, let's set a goal of universal pre-K. Let's prepare every single boy and girl to go into school ready to learn and able to compete.

And let's start making college affordable again.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, it is now so expensive a lot of middle-class and working families can't even afford. And if they do afford it, they go into debt and their kids go into debt.

I'm old enough to remember when we got low, low-interest loans that we could go through college with. Because my father, you know, he's a small-businessman. He said, "OK, I've saved enough money for you to go to college, but I can only pay tuition and board. You want to buy a book? It's up to you."

So, you know, I'd worked since I was 13 -- I said, "Fine. That's a fair deal." And then when I wanted to go to law school he said, "You're on your own. I didn't plan for that."

(LAUGHTER)

So, you know, I had to go borrow money. But in those days you could borrow money at really low interest rates, and the lenders weren't playing kind of a bait-and-switch game on you where they raised the interest rates on you, where they gave you fine print and where you ended up having to pay more than you thought.

We need to set a goal of getting back the respect of the rest of the world, because we've got to lead and we need other countries to work with us.

(APPLAUSE)

Every single problem we face requires us to have alliances, coalitions. We need to start making more friends and allies instead of enemies and adversaries. Because if we're going to deal with terrorism, we've got to have people on our side, don't we? If we're going to deal with global climate change, or HIV/AIDS or any of the other issues that we face around the world, we've got to have people rooting for America again.

I will, as your president, make it my mission to rebuild those relationships. And I'll have some help from, you know, the previous president Clinton...

(LAUGHTER)

... because we'll get out there and we'll tell the world that America is back.

(APPLAUSE)

This is a great campaign, because it's time for a great debate in America. This is a defining moment. We know the last six years have not been good for our country, here at home or around the world. And we need to pull together, work across party lines, bring people into the political process so that we all together can not only look to our leadership as to what needs to be done, but ask ourselves, what can each of us do?

When it comes to health care, we all have to take better care of ourselves. We need to be strong and healthy for the lives that we lead. When it comes to energy, let's conserve more in our homes and our businesses. When it comes to education, let's make sure that we encourage those young people to do the best they can in school, because it's not only good for them. We need their brains, because we are in a competition for the future.

I Want to get back to the point where we can say to any child in America, "Here's what your president wants. Your president wants you to be part of building our nation again."

So I am grateful for this endorsement. It means the world to me. Together, we're not only going to win an election, we're going to take America back and put it on the right track.

Thank you all, and God bless you.

(APPLAUSE)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON DELIVERS REMARKS AT INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FIRE FIGHTERS CONVENTION, 5/11/2007

CLINTON: Thank you.

Oh, we're going to get in trouble for that (inaudible).

(UNKNOWN): She understands.

CLINTON: Yes, I do understand.

You know, Charlie and I have had some great times together. And it's been a privilege and an honor working with him, and with the extraordinary professional firefighters of New York.

I mean, really, it means the world to me to have people like Bob and Charlie say what they said.

I'm proud to be a member of the extended family, Bob. Because there's no family I'd rather be part of.

It's great to be here with all of you. It is exciting to know that the issues that are important to your concerns are going to be at the forefront of my campaign.

I feel so strongly about what we need to do to provide leadership, to give you the tools that you require to do the tough jobs you're asked to do, and to do them safely and under conditions that maximize your authority to make decisions, whether it's collective bargaining decisions or working conditions or safety decisions.

I want to thank our host, Dave, and his whole team for putting this on and having us all here. Dave has been a tremendous leader here in New Hampshire. I've already seen evidence of that. And it's great to be here with his enthusiasm and energy leading the way.

I want to recognize everybody who has come from all these states. Given the political season, of course, I especially want to single out Jack Reed (ph) from Iowa.

(LAUGHTER)

You know, when I think about the challenges that all of you and your members confront, it is clear to me that sometimes you get more lip service and rhetoric than you get support and results.

I mean, it's hard to find anybody who's going to stand up and make a speech against firefighters. I mean, everybody's going to come out and be as strong as possible in telling you that they're on your side.

But when it really matters, we often don't see that support translated into positive programs that will make a difference in the work that you do.

I believe that it is my job to be a good partner with you. That's what I've tried to do in New York. And I appreciate Charlie alluding to some of the issues that we have faced.

Because to me, there aren't many people whose job description includes plunging headfirst into burning buildings, there aren't many people who go to work every day knowing that the unexpected not only could but likely will happen, there are not many people who hold the fate of their coworkers literally in their hands.

CLINTON: So I have no problem being an unabashed supporter. Because I think that it is imperative we stand with you, because you stand with us.

As a senator from New York on 9/11, I know exactly what those sacrifices mean.

We've talked about this before -- some of you were with us in Toronto, when President Schaitberger was kind enough to invite me to speak to you; some of you were with us in Washington at the legislative conference -- but I don't think it can be emphasized enough.

We lost so many brave firefighters that day who weren't even on duty, who came because they had to be there to help; people who rushed into that inferno and kept going up those stairs, laden down with a hundred pounds of equipment, trying to make sure that if there was anybody to save, they would get there.

We all watched it on television, which did not in any way do justice to the horrors that occurred on 9/11.

CLINTON: When I got there the day after -- and we were the only plane in the sky -- I'll never forget what it felt like to land at LaGuardia and then helicopter from LaGuardia to the heliport on the west side of Manhattan, and to look down into what looked to be the mouth of hell. It was so much worse than anything I had even imagined, having watched it for hours.

And as we stood on the street, and we saw firefighters coming out of that curtain of darkness -- some were dragging axes and other equipment -- it seemed to me at that moment that whatever was required to repay the debt that our country owed them, I would want to make sure that happened. The way I see it is, if you serve your country, then your country should return the favor and serve you.

We've been fighting now for six years, nearly, to make sure we take care of those firefighters.

And it wasn't just New Yorkers -- although that was certainly the bulk of the people. But people responded from all over the country. We had teams from Ohio and from California, all of whom pitched in, first in the frantic search for survivors on a rescue mission, and then when it became clear that there wouldn't be very many, a very painful effort to try to recover bodies.

One thing that they had in common, in addition to their courage, is that many of them are now sick. And we are working toward a program to be sure that we provide the health care they need.

For a long time, people didn't really recognize what was happening. A lot of people who had been able to run marathons a week before could barely walk up stairs.

We're starting to see fatalities from the conditions that have been affecting our firefighters; also police officers, other emergency responders, some of the construction workers who dropped everything to come down and help run heavy equipment so that firefighters could get into places that would have otherwise been inaccessible. A lot of volunteers, and even people who live in the area are suffering.

And I have been honored to work with my friends -- Charlie in the state, and my friends in the city -- to try to do everything we can to get the funding to take care of everyone.

CLINTON: But it struck me in the process of making this case, because, you know, I got the first money to do this at the end of 2001. And it was money for a study to try to figure out what has happened with this so-called World Trade Center cough.

And then I realized we were going to have a much bigger problem, got some more money in the budget. The president wouldn't release the money. We had to go through all of that.

We've just been having to fight so hard to do what should be obvious to all of us, and to take care of those that took care of us -- that I was thinking that unfortunately there are so many people in our country right now who are just invisible to our current leadership. They just don't see them.

You know, if you're a child in a crumbling school somewhere, they don't see you.

If you're one of the 9 million kids without health insurance, even though the vast majority have at least one parent who's working, they don't see you either.

CLINTON: If you're a hard-working, you know, middle class man or woman who hasn't had a raise that amounts to much in the last six years, while everything else is going up in cost, you're invisible.

If you're trying to pay your gas pump bill, which keeps going up and up -- now national average back up to $3 and it looks like it's going to go higher over the summer -- you're invisible.

But I never thought our firefighters would be invisible. I never thought that we would have to have so many conference, press conferences, events where we would bring people to Washington, where we would put them in front of the press, where they would talk about their problems, and where we had so much trouble breaking through. Now, with a Democratic Congress, we're going to get something done.

But it's not only on this health issue. If you're a firefighter who can't collectively bargain for good wages and working conditions, if you're a federal firefighter who can't qualify for worker's compensation or disability retirement, if you're a retired firefighter who can't afford health insurance, well, you're invisible, too.

And if you're a soldier who's been wounded or injured in Iraq or Afghanistan, and you come home expecting to get the treatment that had been promised to you, and you're not getting it, and you're not getting the compensation that you thought you were entitled to, well, it turns out you're invisible, too.

Our president has just looked right through you.

Well, you're not invisible to me. And I know that all of these people are not invisible to all of you. And when we take back the White House, you will no longer be invisible to the president of the United States of America.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, today people all across this country are ready for change, aren't they? They are ready for a new beginning.

One man said to me the other day, he wishes he could rewind the 21st century. Let's start it over, because we're on the wrong track.

CLINTON: And that's not what America's about. America's about going into the future with confidence and optimism, rolling up our sleeves, getting to work together.

We're ready for leaders who understand that it is our votes that put them in power and our tax dollars that pay the bill.

We are finished with the corruption and the cronyism. We are finished with the no-bid contracts. We are finished with the revolving door in government, where people serve the government, then go out and make millions of dollars lobbying it.

We are ready for a fresh start. And I am ready to be the president who leads us to that fresh start, starting in January 2009. Because I think...

(APPLAUSE)

I think we need a president again who sets goals for this country.

What are our goals? What is it we're trying to achieve? We've been the greatest country in the history of the world, because when it came to it, we would decide where we wanted to head into the future. And then we would get about the business of doing it.

We'd have leaders who would help to lead the way, but more importantly we had citizens, all of whom did their part.

Well, I want to start setting goals for us again. And one of the goals I want to set has to do with all of you. It is absolutely necessary that you have the equipment and training to do the jobs we expect you to do.

(APPLAUSE)

And no excuses, end of argument.

You know, I've supported the SAFER Act. I've supported the FIRE Act. And you all know that the president is trying to cut funding, trying to eliminate the federal help that is so necessary for many of your departments.

We're going to keep fighting until FIRE and SAFER are fully funded. We're also...

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: We're going to set a goal of making sure that families get the benefits they deserve through the Public Safety Officers Benefits Program.

Now, as you know, the point of the Hometown Heroes Act, which I supported, was to ensure that families of firefighters who suffer a stroke or a heart attack within 24 hours of stressful work -- like fighting a fire -- can receive benefits, because they will have been considered to have died in the line of duty.

Now, more than three years after we passed this act, the Justice Department has only now begun to consider claims. And unfortunately, of the nearly 250 claims they've received so far, they've only reviewed 40 of them and they have denied 38 of them.

Well, I don't know about you, but that doesn't sound right to me. That's why I recently signed onto a letter to the president demanding that the administration give to our families of fallen firefighters the benefits that they deserve under the law we passed.

(APPLAUSE)

We're also going to get the health care for 9/11 passed. I've already had one hearing in the Congress. We couldn't even have a hearing before we had a Democratic majority.

We had a hearing. We heard the evidence. We're going to have another hearing. And we're going to putting together a package to take care of the people that are suffering from not just asthma and bronchitis and sinusitis and laryngitis, but of serious diseases of the lungs, where they can't breathe anymore.

CLINTON: We've had five fatalities that have been linked to the toxins at ground zero. Livers have been polluted. The find of stress on the body has meant that too many people have had to take early retirement and disability.

We created that program to screen but now we have to get the money to treat. And I introduced legislation asking for $1.9 billion for monitoring and treatment. And we're going to get that done, we're going to get that done this year.

Let's also set a goal of using our homeland security funds to actually beef up our first responders and their ability to take care of us. Too much money has been siphoned off at the state level. It hasn't gotten down into the cities and the fire departments and the police departments where it is needed.

We saw in this latest budget from the president that he proposed cutting funds for first responders by $1.7 billion. In what he just vetoed, there was $35 million in helping high-threat urban areas -- like many of the cities represented here -- to respond to catastrophic events.

From the very beginning of this post-9/11 era, I have worked with you, I have worked with the IAFF to come up with a formula that would get the money where it was most needed.

I see Kevin standing there. He practically became a staff member. We were working on legislation to get the money directly to all of you, not going through some byzantine bureaucracy.

But we're still not doing what we need to do. Are we safer? Yes. Are we as safe as we could and should be? No. And nobody knows that better than all of you.

We also, though, have to set some goals for our country.

How about universal health care, so you no longer have to bargain about where you're going to get your health care?

Insurance companies can't discriminate against you. They can't cherry pick. They can't exclude pre-existing conditions.

If you want to be in the health insurance business, it's going to be a new day: Provide health insurance. Don't try to avoid taking care of the people who need it, and who have paid from it.

CLINTON: I just came from Exeter Hospital, where we had a session talking about health insurance, particularly as it affects children.

And one woman -- it was just heartbreaking. She had a 20-year-old daughter in college, on the family policy. The child had pains, went to the doctor, found out she had colon cancer. Under the insurance policy, if she didn't stay as a full-time student, they would drop her coverage.

Her parents had been paying for her for 20 years on their employer-provided health insurance. If she went back to school to be a full-time student, it would sap her strength and might affect her treatment.

What a terrible dilemma to put a parent in.

They had no choice. Their daughter went back, and she took all the treatments that she had to take. Tragically, she died shortly after she turned 21.

We're trying to change the law in memory of that girl, but there are so many examples that I could give you.

Imagine if you didn't have to put health care on the bargaining table in the first place. Think of everything else you could put on the bargaining table, if you were guaranteed health coverage for you and your families.

I am not going to rest until we get quality, affordable health care coverage. And we can do it now, because everybody knows the system we have is costing way too much, too many people are not getting what they thought they'd paid for and too many people are left out altogether.

We also need to set a goal of energy independence. It is long past time for us to be paying so much money to regimes that turn around and use that money against us.

This is no longer a choice. This is a necessity.

How do we get from being dependent on foreign oil to being more independent? Use what we have: Use homegrown fuels.

You know, we can make ethanol to blend with gas from everything from corn to farm waste.

CLINTON: We can make biodiesel from soybeans. We can do what we need to do, what Americans are best at, if we have an approach like an Apollo Project that sent a man to the moon. But we can't do it if we don't have leadership.

I would start by taking the subsidies away from the oil companies. They certainly don't need our tax dollars to make the outrageous profits that they are making.

(APPLAUSE)

Let's make college affordable again. I meet people all over the country who tell me they can't afford to go to college.

I was in Maryland the other day, endorsed by Governor O'Malley, and I was talking about college affordability. And I saw this young woman's head nodding. And afterwards I shook hands with her. I said, "I saw your head nodding when I was mentioning college affordability."

And she said, "Yeah." She said, "I don't have enough money to go to college, so I'm trying to work to make enough money. And one of my friends just had to drop out. And all of my other friends have to go into debt. And then they come out with so much debt that they're paying it off for years."

At the same time, this administration has people supposedly running the student loan program who have taken stock in the student loan companies, who are ripping off families.

We're going to end that abuse. And we're going to start making college affordable for average, middle-class working families so that they can have a dream of sending their kids to college. We're also...

(APPLAUSE)

We're also going to make the tax system fair for families again. All the tax breaks -- the really big tax breaks in the last six years, have all gone to the top, you know, very biggest earners, wealthiest people in America.

Now, I've got to -- with interest of full disclosure, you know, my husband and I never had very much money. When we were in the White House, we didn't have another house to go do. We would, kind of, just wander around the country, looking for friends to take us in.

(LAUGHTER)

We didn't have any ranch. We didn't have any estate, you know...

(LAUGHTER)

So he gets out and he's making money for the first time. I have nothing against that, believe me. It's not bad.

But it's absurd that we have tilted our tax system so much toward people who are doing really well to start with. Let's begin by reforming the alternative minimum tax, which is going to take a big bite out of a lot of people.

If you're a firefighter who's moved up the ranks, and you've got a working spouse who's also making money, and all of a sudden your combined income is over $100,000, bingo. You're going to get hit by the AMT, which was meant to prevent multimillionaires from avoiding paying their taxes.

CLINTON: So we've got to start by fixing that before it further disadvantages so many Americans.

And we're going to start standing up for labor again in this country.

(APPLAUSE)

It is an idea that I try to stress is not just for people who are unionized. I try to make the point that, you know, what's unique about America is not that we have rich people. You can find rich people anywhere in the world, can't you? And you can surely find poor people everywhere in the world.

What is unique about this country is the American middle class.

One of the reasons we have a strong middle class is because people were able to band together and organize for better wages and working conditions, starting in the last century.

Now, it's all out of balance again. We've got people who are appointed to supervise labor at the Department of Labor and the National Labor Relations Board who are not pro-labor. They're not going to enforce the laws. We've got more workplace safety issues because nobody is looking out for the worker.

A lot of people don't get this. They basically go right after unions. You know, they talk about collective bargaining undermining our national security.

Well, let me tell you something: Collective bargaining is as American as apple pie. And it's time we stood up for the right of people to have a voice in the workplace.

(APPLAUSE)

So when I'm president, we're going to have a Department of Labor that's actually pro-labor. We're going to make the union agenda...

(APPLAUSE)

... the American middle-class agenda again.

We're going to make it absolutely clear that the union bug stands for something. It's not time to call the exterminator, like the White House does when they see it.

(LAUGHTER)

And I think that we can begin to get a little balance into the balance of power.

And, finally, let's end the war in Iraq in the right way and start bringing our combat troops home, out of this sectarian civil war.

(APPLAUSE)

We know very well the high price that has been paid. And I'm working with my colleagues to try to figure out how to persuade the president to change direction.

We sent him a responsible bill last week. It would have funded our troops and begun to bring them home. And he vetoed it.

That bill also had money for the medical monitoring and treatment that I put in for firefighters after September 11th.

CLINTON: It included funding to rebuild fire stations in Louisiana that had been destroyed by Hurricane Katrina.

But I'm not giving up. And I don't think you'll find any Democrat who is giving up on doing everything we can.

And we're being joined by more Republicans. You know, a group of Republicans went to the White House on Tuesday and told the president that it was time for him to change course. He was losing the support of Republicans as well.

So we're hoping to get that message through. There's a lot of different ways to approach it. And I'm open to whatever can work.

I've joined forces with Senator Byrd from West Virginia to push a simple way forward: end the president's authority for the war.

It will be five years, as of October 11, 2007. He wants to continue a military mission in Iraq: Make him come to the American people and explain it. Let's have a debate about it. No more avoiding the hard issues about what it is we're doing there.

We gave the Iraqi people a chance for a better future. Our young men and women have sacrificed for their freedom. This is their war to win. And we can't win it for them.

And it is time that the president recognize that, and put some requirements on the Iraqis instead of giving them the blank check that they've had for way too long.

We're going to do everything possible to start bringing our troops home. But if the president will not act -- and standing here before you today, I don't know whether he will or not -- if he does not extricate us from Iraq before he leaves office, when I am president I will, beginning on the day that I am inaugurated. We're going to end our combat involvement.

Now, there may be some remaining vital national security interests, dealing with the Al Qaida network that now is in Iraq, looking for a way to make sure they don't come back on us. There may be some remaining missions, but those are minor missions in the sense of the numbers of troops that are involved. They're important, but they don't require the kind of buildup that the president has engaged in.

You know, this is not going to be easy. But I'm ready. And, obviously, I'm sure you've noticed that I'm a woman running for president.

(LAUGHTER)

As a friend of mine said, "Can't be anything else." That's the way I've lived my life.

CLINTON: And people ask me all the time, "Well, will Americans vote for a woman?" I said, "I don't know until we try."

I think Americans are ready for a leader who can make tough decisions. I think Americans are ready for the experience and qualifications that we need in the White House again.

There's no time to study these issues. We face a lot of dangers around the world, and we face them here at home. We need to be prepared immediately to defend our country, protect our vital national security interests, but begin trying to forge alliances and not alienation.

We cannot deter and defeat the terrorists abroad if we don't have people pulling for us. You can't get good intelligence. You can't rely on their law enforcement or their military help if they don't want to be with us.

One of the jobs of the next president will be to rebuild those connections again.

I'm aware of how hard this job is. It's always a hard job, and I've seen it more closely than anybody else. But it's going to be a really difficult job because of everything that has happened in the previous eight years by the time we get a new president.

And I also know that it will take everybody helping. Not only do we need a new president, but we need a country committed to making some tough decisions again.

If we're ready to take on the problems we face, then I'm ready to take on the responsibility of leading us to do that.

And I'm willing to work with anybody. I know, as some of you might recall, I wasn't exactly the endorsed candidate when I ran for the Senate back in New York. The firefighters endorsed my opponent, the police endorsed my opponent, and some people said, "Well, you know, they're not for you." "That's OK; I'm for them. You know, my job is to be for them. I didn't expect 100 percent of the vote. What I expect is that we'll be good partners to get results that really matter in people's lives."

CLINTON: When I got to the Congress, when I entered the Senate, people said, "How are you going to work with people who haven't exactly been friendly to you over these years?" And my attitude said, "Look, my job is to work with anybody to get things done for the people I represent."

And that's what I've done. I've worked across the party lines with people that I wasn't sure I'd ever talk to, let alone work with. But we found common ground, because what really matters is what we do. I'm tired of politics being about all this partisanship and posturing and, you know -- enough. That's not the way a great country stays great.

And so I will work with anybody, and I will make any coalition to get what I think done for the country that's in its best interests.

I want to end with a little story.

In 1995, my husband former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright to go to Europe to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II. Madeleine had been born in the former Czechoslovakia, her family had had to deal with Nazism and communism, so she was happy to go.

She went over there and she went to what is now the Czech Republic. She traveled all over the country and everywhere she went she saw American flags. Not unusual perhaps. But as she looked at them, she realized they only had 48 stars.

She started asking people, "Where did you get this flag?" And the answer was the same: "When the American G.I.s liberated us, they gave us these flags. And we kept them, we guarded them for 50 years."

No matter how dangerous it was with Soviet occupation, when Soviet tanks rolled into Prague, if the people had been caught with an American flag it could have been really serious for them -- but those were family treasures, and people took care of them.

And when Madeleine asked them why, they all said the same thing: "Because we love America. Because we want to have the values that you live by in America."

I want to be the president who not only restores that feeling about our country around the world, but more importantly that's what I want us to feel about ourselves again. I want us to be proud of the goodness and greatness of this country. There's nothing we can't do if we decide to make a decision to set some goals and work together to achieve them.

Thank you all very much.

(APPLAUSE)

MODERATOR: Time for any questions?

CLINTON: Yeah, I'd love to. Absolutely.

MODERATOR: Thank you, Senator, for coming to this little union meeting...

(LAUGHTER)

... amongst friends and family.

The senator said she'd take a few questions before we break for lunch.

QUESTION: In the fire service and some others around the country, we depend on our defined-benefit-type retirement plans to provide a quality of life for us in our retirement. And currently there seems to be a lot of influence on elected officials, from the executive branch down, to look at tapping into those trillions of dollars and converting them to defined-contribution plans, where, frankly, a lot of people can make a lot of money managing those funds.

QUESTION: What can be done, what can you do, to help stop that kind of a money-grab at our expense?

CLINTON: It's a really serious problem. And if I'm not mistaken, I think Dave and the New Hampshire firefighters are working hard on some retirement issues in this current legislature, I believe. Because you're right: It's happening across the country, you know.

First of all, how do we make sure we've got the resources in the (inaudible) has already been very successful. And in some instances, it's even worse than that, because a lot of companies were taken into bankruptcy and their entire pension was eliminated or severely reduced.

I think we have to hold the line as much as we can on what remains of defined benefit plans and do what we can to try to protect the promises (inaudible) some of those are under state law or, you know, city law, so the federal government has a role, but it might not have the primary role, so we're going to have to look at how we create a system of retirement security that is going to really be there for people.

CLINTON: And I don't think we should it make it worse by going after the defined benefit plans that are still operating. So I would certainly try to figure out a way to stop the erosion of defined benefit plans, and then try to figure out what we're going to do...

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON DELIVERS REMARKS AT A CAMPAIGN EVENT, 5/14/2007

SCHUMER: Thank you. Thank you. Is this a great day for New York?

AUDIENCE: Yes.

SCHUMER: Is this a great day for America.

AUDIENCE: Yes.

SCHUMER: Thank you. It is.

Now, in about 45 minutes, President Bush will give a speech about energy. It will be typical of his efforts. His speech will not be well thought out.

(LAUGHTER)

It will be half-baked. And it will make sure not to offend the big oil companies.

We need a president who is going to think the problems through. We need a president who is not going to be afraid to take on the special interests. And we need a president who is going to be effective at getting things done.

We need Hillary Rodham Clinton for president of the United States.

(APPLAUSE)

I want to tell you all a little story. Many of you know it, but maybe the rest of the country doesn't.

When Hillary Clinton first announced for senator six years ago, there were many people who were skeptical. There were many people who said she can't win. There were many people who said that she shouldn't run.

What did Hillary Clinton do? She went around the state. And in her own way that almost no one can duplicate, she listened to the people of New York. She listened to the people on the dairy farms of Wyoming County, and she listened to the people in the inner city in the Bronx, and she listened to the people in the suburbs of Manlius.

And then, as only Hillary Rodham Clinton can do, after listening, she came up with a program, a program that would help every portion of this state. And she worked hard and diligently. And she never got thrown off track by the naysayers and those who had animus. And she kept going forward and forward and forward.

And she put down all the naysayers and put down all the skeptics, and she won New York by nearly a landslide in 2000.

(APPLAUSE)

Well, I want to tell you, what Hillary Clinton did in New York six years ago she is going to do in 2008 as our presidential nominee and as president of the United States.

(APPLAUSE)

SCHUMER: Ladies and gentlemen, we took back the Senate in 2006, we took back the House in 2006, and under Hillary Rodham Clinton's leadership we're going to take back the White House in 2008.

(APPLAUSE)

So it is my honor to be part of Hillary's team, and I'm proud to be part of Hillary's team because Hillary's team is America's team. And we will move on to victory, and then we will straighten out the problems we face in health care and education and foreign policy and energy. And even those skeptics will say they are glad that Hillary Rodham Clinton is running for reelection almost unanimously in 2012.

(APPLAUSE)

So it is my honor to be here today. I can tell you what a great senator she has been. I can tell you what a great candidate she has been. And I know what a great president she will be.

It is now my honor to introduce a friend of mine, somebody who has worked so hard and diligently for the people of this state, someone who has a vision of what needs to be done to make our state better. None other than our great governor, Eliot Spitzer.

(APPLAUSE)

SPITZER: Thank you, Chuck. Thank you, Chuck, for your years of leadership.

And we know as we stand here today, if there's one person to whom we can say thank you for taking back the United States Senate, restoring democracy and our values to that great chamber, it is Chuck Schumer.

Chuck, we all say thank you for what you have done.

(APPLAUSE)

SPITZER: Today we stand here unified in purpose, unified in one cause, and that is to restore these great United States of America to our rightful position in the world, the position of leadership, a leadership based on ideas, moral values, economic prowess, and, yes, military strength.

But we know there is one person who can bring us back, one person who has the vision, the courage, the guts to say what has to be said, to stand up to those interests who do not like to be stood up to. One person who back when it was not popular to talk about health care reform, she did it. When it was not popular to talk about failing education, she did it.

(APPLAUSE)

When it was not popular to talk about a military that needed reform, she did it.

She is a New Yorker through and through because she has wisdom, courage, guts. That is what defines us as a state and a nation.

When we look around the globe today, when we look around our nation, we see crisis. We see a gilded age where some know no bounds to what they can afford to buy and how they can live.

But too many others, thousands, millions, our middle class, that is suffering. Health care that drives people to bankruptcy. College bills they cannot afford. An environment that is being squandered. Jobs that are going overseas.

We know we need a new leader who understands how to address these problems, not with cheap talk, not with platitudes, not with cheap answers that after years of George Bush in the White House we know they have failed.

It is crystal clear they cannot govern, they do not know how, and it's too late to give them another chance.

(APPLAUSE)

SPITZER: We have a candidate. We have a candidate who brings every quality we need, and we know there's an old cliché, "A crisis is a terrible thing to waste."

And so we will take the crisis of today -- a crisis in foreign policy, in domestic economics, in ethics -- a crisis that needs somebody tall to stand up with pride and say, "I am proud to lead this nation, proud to look back at the values that we stand for, proud on this day that screams out as Norman Rockwell's paintings did of the great America that we dream of."

We know who that person is, somebody whom we've gotten to know as New Yorkers so often before at moments of crisis when she was there after 9/11 and she came through with that much needed federal aid, there in crisis in the Southern Tier when there were floods and she came through with sustenance and aid and moral leadership, crisis at every moment when elsewhere in Washington there was a vacuum.

And so it is with great pride that all of us assemble here today to say with one voice, "We endorse a candidacy of somebody who has proven herself time and time again, the candidacy of somebody who speaks to our hearts, to our vision, somebody whom we dream of seeing of the White House as president because we know will bring great days, once again, back to this nation.

Ladies and gentlemen, New Yorkers, citizens of this great state and nation, I present to you the next president of the United States, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Thank you, New York.

CLINTON: Thank you.

This is an absolutely extraordinary experience, to stand here with so many of you on this glorious May day, with my team, this great New York team that we are part of as we lead New York into a better future and to see the possibility that this means for our country.

You know, every election is about the future, and I look out here and I see all of these students, all these young people who are here today, and I know that this election is about them. It is about what kind of lives they will have in our country.

(APPLAUSE)

I want to thank my colleagues in government and public service. We are so fortunate to have Eliot Spitzer as our governor.

(APPLAUSE)

Governor Spitzer has already made a difference in so many ways, in education and health care, and it's just beginning. I'm proud of the work that he's doing and hope to be a good partner for him in Washington.

It is hard to be a governor when there is nobody home in the White House to hear your concerns.

(APPLAUSE)

And, Lieutenant Governor Paterson, thank you for your work. You've already made a mark here in the capital as a member of the Senate.

(APPLAUSE)

And now you're leading the charge on stem cell research and so many other important issues that matter to New Yorkers.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Speaker Silver, thank you for your support and leadership.

Speaker Silver used to kid me because he had such a big Democratic majority and we didn't, in Congress.

And I used to ask for a few Democrats to be sent down to Washington.

(APPLAUSE)

Well, now we've got a Democratic majority. And we look to Speaker Silver and his Democrats to really lead the way, here in New York, about the important issues that have to be addressed.

(APPLAUSE)

And Senator Malcolm Smith is the Democratic leader in the senate. I hope some day he will be the majority leader, in the not-too-distant future.

(APPLAUSE)

And what a start Andrew Cuomo has as our attorney general, tackling...

(APPLAUSE)

... tackling an issue that I hear about everywhere in our state, and now across the country. College is becoming unaffordable for the average hardworking, middle-class family and their children.

(APPLAUSE)

I can't think of anybody more determined and dogged to take on the student loan industry and all of their scandals than Attorney General Andrew Cuomo.

(APPLAUSE)

And thanks to my longtime friend, Comptroller Tom DeNapoli. Tom was actually...

(APPLAUSE)

Tom was one of the very first people who urged me to run for president.

We were at a "Welcome home" parade for Sarah Hughes, the great Olympic gold medalist, and we're watching the parade and somebody was holding a "Tom DeNapoli for President" sign.

(LAUGHTER)

And I said, "Tom, look at that." And he goes, "You first."

(LAUGHTER)

Thank you, Tom, for your kind words.

And I also want to acknowledge, in the crowd, New York City Council Speaker Chris Quinn...

(APPLAUSE)

... New York State Democratic Chair June O'Neill...

(APPLAUSE)

... and I want to say a special word about my friends and colleagues in the Congress. No one could have a better partner than Chuck Schumer.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Senator Schumer is an indefatigable legislator. He is constantly on the move, looking for new ways to help people, trying to come up with new takes on issues. He and I have worked closely together over the last years.

I'm extraordinarily grateful to him for his friendship and his guidance, his partnership, and I look forward to many more years where we serve the people of New York and the United States together.

Thank you so much, Chuck.

(APPLAUSE)

Also making the trip to Albany today are some of the members of the House: Mike Arcuri, Kirsten Gillibrand, John Hall, Maurice Hinchey, Steve Israel, Gary Ackerman, and your own Mike McNulty.

(APPLAUSE)

I want to thank some of the mayors who have come with whom I'm worked closely over the last years.

Of course, Mayor Jennings of Albany, thank you, Byron Brown from Buffalo, Matt Driscoll from Syracuse, Brian Stratton from Schenectady, Le Roy Akins from Glens Falls, and all the mayors who are here.

And let me also recognize my county executive from Westchester County, Andy Spano; Albany County's county executive, Michael Breslin; and from Long Island, Tom Suozzi from Nassau County and Steve Levy from Suffolk County.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: I also appreciate all the assembly members and state senators who are here, as well as other elected officials. Thank you all.

(APPLAUSE)

It has been an honor working with all of these elected officials and so many more across the state and so many citizens. As Chuck said, he and I crisscross the state, all 62 counties, going places to hear what's on people's minds and trying to come up with solutions to problems.

That's the way I think public service is supposed to work. I think it's my job to try to figure out how to help you solve the problems that stand in the way of your making a good living, of getting a good education, having access to health care and so much more.

(APPLAUSE)

Well, for the last six years that's not what we've had in the White House. We've had ideology and partisanship, but we haven't had leaders who brought us together, said let's roll up our sleeves and let's get to work on behalf of America.

You know, I was raised to believe that I had a strong family behind me, and I did.

My dad was a World War II vet, came home from the Navy, started a small business, started a family, taught me those basic American values of hard work and individual responsibility and self-reliance.

And my mother, who didn't have a very easy life of it, her parents were very young, they got divorced back in the 1920s, which wasn't easy, and they sent her and her little sister, when my mom was 8 and her little sister was 3, by themselves on a train from Chicago to California to live with her father's parents.

After a while, that didn't work out very well, so she left home at 13 and went to work in somebody else's house as a mother's helper.

You know, it sounds kind of harsh, a 13-year-old basically out on her own like that. She had to get up early in the morning and prepare the children of the house to go to school. But in return she got to continue to go to high school, and for my mother that was very important. And she also saw a family that really loved and supported each other.

So although she never got a chance to go to college, she believed in education, and she believed in doing everything she could to give my brothers and me the best start in life.

And I had a community. You know, I wrote a book called "It Takes a Village."

(APPLAUSE)

I believe that it takes a lot of people working together. People, yes, in government, people who guard our streets as our police officers, who protect us, like our firefighters, our teachers, our coaches, our clergy, people working together.

But I also believed I had my country on my side.

CLINTON: I believe that we as Americans have been given a great gift. And part of it was to do our part to help realize the goals of America.

You know, when President Kennedy said we were going to send a man to the moon and bring him back in the decade, I didn't know we were going to do that, but I never doubted we would.

And when President Johnson said, "We are going to end discrimination, and we're going to begin to act like the Americans we should be and guarantee the right to vote," I knew it would be hard, but I never doubted we could do it.

Well, what are our goals today? If one of these children ask you, "What are the goals of America?" what is our answer? We haven't set them. We don't have a vision that has goals for where we need to be as the greatest nation on Earth.

Well, I want to be a president who sets goals for America again. And I believe...

(APPLAUSE)

I believe we're ready for that.

Let's set a goal of quality, affordable, universal health care coverage for every single American.

(APPLAUSE)

Let's set a goal...

AUDIENCE MEMBERS: Hillary! Hillary! Hillary!

CLINTON: Thank you.

(LAUGHTER)

Let's set a goal of energy independence and security. Enough with the talk. Enough with the speeches. Let's have an Apollo Project that says once and for all, we're going to end our dependence on foreign oil and move toward green renewable energy.

(APPLAUSE)

And I know how we can start doing it. I've proposed a strategic energy fund. And I know where we can get the money for it. Let's take away the subsidies from the oil companies, and have them be part of the solution instead of the problem.

(APPLAUSE)

Let's set a goal of new, good, high-paying jobs for Americans.

You know everybody knows CEO pay is up, the stock market is up, corporate profits are up. But you know what isn't up: Average wages and income are not up. And it is time...

(APPLAUSE)

It is time we had a president again who stood up for the American middle class, which, after all, represents the best of our country and is the engine of economic prosperity.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: I believe we can create millions of new jobs through a new energy future and from tackling global climate change.

I have seen it in our own state.

I have been to Cummins Engine, that is making an engine for low- sulfur diesel that they are now going to be exporting around the world from Jamestown.

I've been to Corning, which is creating filters to catch all of the pollution from diesels like on our school buses. Hundreds of people are being employed.

I have visited our universities that are doing research in new solar, new wind, new biodiesel and biofuels.

Let us begin to do this as a nation. We don't have anything to be afraid of. There is nothing America can't do, if we put our minds to it and work together.

(APPLAUSE)

Let's set a goal in education. Let's begin by changing No Child Left Behind, an unfunded mandate that has fallen heavily on our schools.

(APPLAUSE)

Let's look at preschool education, where we can give young children a real fighting chance to be competitive when they get to school. And on the other end, let's help the attorney general finish his work and make college affordable again.

You know...

(APPLAUSE)

... when I went to college my late father said, "We've saved enough money for tuition and board. But if you want to buy a book, you're going to have to earn the money." And that was OK, because I'd worked ever since I was 13.

And then I decided to go law school. And I came back and I told my dad. And he said, "That wasn't part of the bargain."

(LAUGHTER)

So I could go out and borrow money from the federal government, a program called the National Defense Education Act. I could borrow at a very low interest rate. I didn't have to worry about these student loan companies ripping me and my family off.

I don't want any family to have to worry about that again. And we're going to fix that as soon as we can.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: You know, we can't do any of this if we don't reform our government. We have seen a culture of corruption and cronyism in the last six years.

Let's end the no-bid contracts for Halliburton and all the friends of this administration.

(APPLAUSE)

And, of course, we have a lot of work to do around the world.

You know, the members of Congress, Senator Schumer and I are working every single day to try to persuade or require the president to change course in Iraq. We passed legislation that would have funded our troops and began to bring them home. He vetoed that. He vetoed the will of the American people.

Well, we are telling the president that we will keep working until we have a policy that begins to bring our troops home and extricate us from the sectarian civil war in Iraq.

(APPLAUSE)

But I want to be completely clear with you: If the president does not end the war in Iraq before he leaves office, when I'm president I will, as soon as I take office.

(APPLAUSE)

And, you know, let's begin building bridges and alliances with our friends and people around the world. We can't win the war against terrorism without friends who will stand up with us, report suspicious activity, be on our side.

We can't deal with global climate change unless the United States leads and the world comes with us, or with HIV/AIDS or any of our global challenges.

I want to be a president who begins to bring the world back together under American leadership, using our moral authority, using our values again.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, my friend and our former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright went to Europe at my husband's request in 1995 to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II.

CLINTON: Some of you may know she was born in Czechoslovakia. She had to confront Nazism and communism. And so she was the perfect person to represent us.

So she traveled throughout Europe and then she got to what is now the Czech Republic and she went all over the country. And everywhere she went she saw American flags. But as she looked more closely, she realized these flags only had 48 stars.

And she started asking people, "Where did you get this flag?"

And the answer was the same: "When the American G.I.s liberated us, they gave us these flags. And we have guarded them for 50 years. We knew that it would have been dangerous to have been found with them, and certainly under Soviet occupation."

And when the Soviet tanks came into Prague, someone found with an American flag would have been in very serious trouble.

And Madeleine says, "Why did you save these flags?"

They said, "Because we love America. We believe in America's values. We want to live by those values."

I want to be the president who restores that feeling around the world again.

(APPLAUSE)

But equally importantly, I want us to feel about ourselves that way again. This is a good and great nation. And I want us to believe it and to feel that we are contributing to its progress.

But I can't do this without your help. And I'm asking you to join my campaign, to be part of it, across New York, to reach out to your friends and colleagues who live across America.

I want to ask you to join in a very specific way today.

Now, as you know, we have a Web site, <http://www.hillaryclinton.com>. But now, for the very first time, you can use your cell phones and text messaging to communicate with me and to join the campaign.

It's a first. And I wanted to start it right here in the state of firsts, in New York, right here in our state capital.

(APPLAUSE)

So are you ready?

(APPLAUSE)

Well, take out your phones. If you have a phone, open it up, raise them up high. Now, get ready to send me a text message.

(LAUGHTER)

All right. Send "Join" to 77007. That is, send a text message to this number, 77007, and type the word "join," J-O-I-N, to become part of my campaign for change.

Now, if you text message every day, it's a snap. But if it's new to you, ask for help from somebody, especially a young person who's nearby...

(LAUGHTER)

... because they know how to do this.

So join us now, here in person, on the Web or on your phone. Ask your friends, your families, your neighbors and your co-workers to be part of this campaign for change.

I need your help. If you're ready for change in America, I'm ready to lead it.

Thank you all very, very much.

(APPLAUSE)

DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF CONGRESS HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON TROOP PAY INCREASES, 5/22/2007

CLINTON: Well, thank you so much, Senator Kerry.

I'm proud to join Senator Kerry, along with the members of Congress, to support raising the salaries of our men and women who wear the uniform of our country.

Now, this is a moment of profound challenge for America. And it's especially a moment of great danger for our men and women who serve us.

While there are strong disagreements here in Washington on any subject you can name, I hope we can unite around our common values when it comes to how we treat our service members.

Now, if you serve your country, your country should serve you. That's the promise that we make when a young man or woman signs up to defend the United States of America.

Sadly, too often in the past several years that promise has been broken, whether it's a lack of armored Humvees or body armor, a lack of appropriate care and outpatient facilities at Walter Reed and elsewhere or a lack of the necessary resources in the V.A..

And now we learn that the Bush administration stands against a modest pay increase, a modest pay raise to support the families of those who serve, to cover the expenses of everyday life, to live on the modest salary that we provide for the men and women of our military.

You know, the pattern is clear. The president asks our troops and their families to bear a great burden. But when it comes time to match that sacrifice with enough resources or smart strategies, the president is not there.

We're borrowing billions to cover the cost of the war in Iraq. Think about it this way: Every day, we borrow money from China to pay our troops. I think that undermines our security. Why compound it by not providing the pay raise that our troops need in order to do the work that we've asked them to do?

We obviously have bigger issues -- when we finally are able to address them -- with respect to how we're going to fund the military, what we're going to do with respect to fiscal responsibility and how we're going to take care of the V.A.

CLINTON: But now the issue before us is whether we're going to provide this modest raise.

I met Captain Patrick Murphy in Baghdad in 2003. And he made a tremendously positive impression on me. He was serving with the 82nd Airborne. I was with Jack Reed. We went from the Green Zone into Sadr City to go to the forward operating post that the 82nd had set up. I was privileged to have lunch with then-Captain Murphy.

And, you know, maybe it's because I have a lot of personal contact with the young men and women who wear the uniform from New York, and now increasingly from around our country. Maybe it's because I've done a lot of work with our wounded vets and have seen the impact of losing limbs and suffering from traumatic brain injury. Maybe it's because these are the best that America has to offer. But for the life me, I don't understand why this administration would stand in the way of giving this pay increase to our military.

We know that they deserve it. And we know that we're going to do everything we can in the Democratic Congress to make sure that they get it.

MURPHY: Thanks, ma'am.

Thanks, everybody, for being here. I'm Patrick Murphy from the 8th District of Pennsylvania, which is Bucks County, northeast Philadelphia and a small slice of Montgomery County.

I left active duty back in 2004, when I came back from Baghdad. And I was a member of the 82nd Airborne Division.

I serve on the Armed Services Committee, so we were the ones that did the markup to this bill. And I always point when they say, "Well, support the troops." We are the troops.

There's 49 new freshmen in Congress, in the House of Representatives. Five of those 49 are veterans. All five are Democrats.

Now, I was kidding with someone the other day. Tim Walz and I share a very small apartment here on Capitol Hill. And someone said, "Well, you know, you were a captain. He was a command sergeant major. So you outrank Tim Walz."

I said, "Obviously, you didn't serve in the military if you think a command sergeant major is outranked by a captain."

(LAUGHTER)

MURPHY: But I want to talk about what we believe in, the values that we believe in, and the things that we need to do to support our troops.

This defense bill is making sure that our armed forces, which have been stretched so thin by this president, are ready and able to continue protecting our families here at home.

We support the troops and we are giving them the right equipment, like mine-resistant vehicles. We are giving them a pay raise, not a pay raise that we really should be giving them, but a 3.5 percent pay raise. And we are increasing the benefits to those spouses who had to face the worst news of all -- the death of their husband or wife.

Unfortunately, President Bush's opposition to doing the right thing by our troops is a pattern of neglect. I'm sad to say this is not the first time this has happened under his watch.

When I was back in Baghdad, back in 2003, in August it was 138 degrees. They called it fire month. And the Pentagon under the Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and President Bush wanted to cut our combat pay. They wanted to cut our combat pay in the middle of a war zone. And that's an increase in pay to our soldiers in monthly stipend.

And threatening to cut what's called imminent danger pay, and threatening to veto this bill with a pay raise, shows that President Bush is out of touch with the needs of our military.

With this defense bill, with this pay raise we're not talking about a lot of money. But if you're an enlisted man with a couple years of service under your belt the money can make all the difference in the world. A pay raise of 3.5 percent for a private making $17,000 a year is less than $1,000 per year.

But with bills to pay and young children to support, several hundred dollars a year is a big deal.

MURPHY: As someone who's fought in Iraq and spoken to our families shattered by tragedy, it is wrong that President Bush will threaten another reckless veto against our soldiers.

We need to make sure our armed forces are strong, both in equipment and in spirit. We need to make sure they are prepared to face future threats.

This defense bill takes care of the present troops while keeping an eye on our future ones.

Mr. President, do the right thing -- for a change -- and sign this bill.

Thank you very much.

And, now, my roommate.

Come on in, Sergeant Major Tim Walz.

(LAUGHTER)

WALZ: Well, thank you to my roommate, Captain Murphy.

(LAUGHTER)

But a special thank you to two of the staunchest supporters the military's had, and I say that to you as the highest ranking enlisted soldier to ever serve in Congress since the beginning of this nation, Senator Kerry and Senator Clinton. They understand this absolutely the way it is.

And our soldiers -- and our soldiers in uniform, especially in harm's way, are the greatest asset this nation has.

We have a president and an administration that seems to play that to the American public. And they oftentimes stand in front of those soldiers. But they have the opportunity this week to stand behind them and to do the right thing. And they chose against that.

Having come and spent my career in the National Guard and the overemphasis on the National Guard and the heavy burden that's being placed on these soldiers, my district of southern Minnesota is home to the 1st Brigade Combat Team of the 34th Division. That division has been in Iraq now and has been deployed since August of 2005. They are going to have the distinction of being the longest deployed National Guard unit in the country.

They're scheduled to get back in August if all goes well. That will be 22 months.

The burden that's being placed on this family adds an extra burden. When the president says they simply need to keep place with the private sector, the private sector doesn't have single parents trying to shuffle kids off to soccer games and trying to get them to school with a single parent while the father and mother are in harm's way in Iraq.

What we try to do is make a modest increase to this -- a modest increase to try and show our thanks and appreciation to our soldiers.

And I can tell you, having been with these soldiers and having been with deployed, they're not in it for the money. But the money helps keep their mind off the troubles at home. The money helps keep them focused on the mission at hand. The money helps keep them knowing that their family's being taken care of so they can do our business.

And by the president to flippantly announce that this was unnecessary shows a total disregard of the reality of what soldiers go through.

So I want to thank the leadership in the House. I want to thank, especially, Captain Murphy, who has been there every step of the way for these soldiers and understanding this is not a partisan issue; this is not about trying to stage an event to make sure that you get the press, to stand in front of the soldiers.

This is about saying these people are sacrificing, whether you agree with the mission or not, you do agree that these soldiers need to be taken care of.

So I applaud them. I applaud our Senate leadership. And I applaud our House leadership for bringing this to a vote and getting the support that it needed.

So I thank you for that.

EMANUEL: I want to make a couple quick points that haven't been made. The Kaiser Foundation did a study. One out of five of our military families rely on either food stamps or the WIC program to make ends meet -- one out of five.

So we are talking about something that's essential to folks.

EMANUEL: The second is, I've participated in an administration where we've written a number of administration policies. I really want to know who the knucklehead is that said that combat pay -- that pay at 3.5 percent is too much. I want to know who the person is that recommended a $40 a month survivor's benefit was too much for the wealthiest country in the world.

Now, I applaud the administration for one simple thing, because when you write a statement of administration policy, not just one person sees it, everybody looks at it, and not one person in that administration said, "You know what? This may be a political problem. Forget the policy. This may be a mistake. We're in the middle of Iraq and Afghanistan and we're going to deny a pay increase of 3.5 percent and survivor benefits of a month for $40."

And nobody who looked at that statement, after everything Patrick said, during combat pay, they opposed it. Imminent danger pay increase -- opposed it. Nobody thought, having seen this, it was wrong.

And since last Thursday when we've been hitting on this, there is still not one statement out of the administration on this. We're asked them to tell us why you would veto a bill over an increase in pay for our enlistees and a survivor's benefit and nobody will take ownership of this issue. Not one person.

And the only thing I can say, having opposed this pay raise, opposing this survivor's benefit, opposing the combat pay, and opposing the imminent danger pay, they are consistent in their opposition to the pay increases for our enlistees and Guard and Reserve.

Rhetoric is fine. Put the resources next to the rhetoric. But nobody in this administration has taken ownership of this veto threat.

They will get on the president's desk a defense authorization bill that increases the combat pay and ensures the survivor benefits has an additional $40.

And then the president will have to make a choice: to stand by the policy recommendations of a veto based on those two things or stand by what the American people, as my colleague said, not in front of them, but behind them.

It's the right thing to do, and the president will have a choice to make.

KERRY: Any questions?

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, you're on the Armed Services Committee. It's going to decide today in the Personnel Subcommittee whether it's going to include the pay raise...

CLINTON: We are recommending that it be included.

CLINTON: As you may well know, we don't talk about the markup of the defense authorization bill until it's over. And so therefore, I can't go into details, but you can be assured that a number of us are certainly proposing that we include the House-passed pay raise.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: I have voted to lower the number of the temporary guest workers. I have voted against the idea of a guest worker program that has a lot of problems associated with it, as I think this one does.

We are still in negotiation. We are still trying to figure out what alternatives we might have. And so stay tuned.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: Well, again, you know, we don't yet have the supplemental. There's a lot of discussion in the press about it, but unless the House has it -- do you have it now, Congressman Emanuel?

EMANUEL: Let me just say this...

(CROSSTALK)

EMANUEL: I got it, thank you. This one I know how to do.

(LAUGHTER)

But I appreciate the guidance and counsel.

Let me say this, out of respect to our leadership. If I'm not mistaken the two leaders, Senator Reid and Speaker Pelosi, are going to be holding a press conference a little later. And I don't want to be presumptuous and get ahead of them. It's a fair question, but I think they'll answer it then, if you just hold off until about 2:15.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON DELIVERS REMARKS AT MANCHESTER SCHOOL OF TECHNOLOGY, 5/29/2007

(JOINED IN PROGRESS)

CLINTON: ... a middle-class lifestyle.

Now, during the second half of the 1990s, productivity growth led to rising incomes across the board.

But over the past six years, while productivity has gone up 18 percent -- that means Americans are working harder than ever and, by most indicators, working harder than anybody else in the rest of the world -- family incomes have gone down $1,300.

The global labor market may even be depressing wages for skilled and professional jobs. Since 2001, new jobs created in America pay, on average, 21 percent less than the jobs we have lost.

And back in 2000, child poverty was the lowest it had been in 20 years. Since then it has risen by 1.3 million. And today we have 12 million children living in poverty.

Now, given these realities, it's unsurprising we're seeing rising inequality and rising pessimism in our workforce.

Today more than 80 percent of Americans believe that our manufacturing jobs are at risk of being outsourced.

And let's be clear. It's not as if America hasn't been successful economically these past years. But the measure of success doesn't relate what's happening in households across our country, because, while productivity and corporate profits are up, the fruits of that success just hasn't reached many of our families. It's like trickle-down economics, but without the trickle.

As a result, the gap between those who are enjoying the fruits of the modern economy and those who aren't is growing wider.

In 1970, the top 1 percent of households held roughly 9 percent of our nation's income. In 2005, they held 22 percent, the highest level since 1929, a year that isn't exactly one of our best years in American history.

Now, our founders knew that inequality wasn't good for our country. They believed that vast concentrations of wealth were a threat to democracy. They believed America should give everyone, not just the children of the landed gentry, the chance to fulfill their God-given potential.

But today, that ideal is at risk. We are in danger of losing that uniquely American engine of opportunity that has created so much wealth and spread it so widely.

CLINTON: Believe it or not, today in some parts of Europe there is more social mobility than right here in America.

Well, now we haven't heard much from Washington in the past six years about how to solve this growing problem of inequality. In fact, the tax, investment, trade and budget policies of the administration and its allies in Congress have made the problem worse.

I believe people are fed up with the policies of the past six years. So many people I talk to just want to hit the restart button on the 21st century and redo it the right way. And I agree with them.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, after all, we started the decade with rising incomes, declining inequality, robust job growth and a surplus in our federal budget. Instead of building on policies that worked, the Washington Republicans reversed them with predictable but intolerable consequences.

I believe that one of the most crucial jobs of the next president is to define a new vision of economic fairness and prosperity for the 21st century, a vision for how we ensure greater opportunity for our next generation, and then to outline a strategy and then to implement it.

Today, I believe we need a new progressive vision for this new century.

Now, I consider myself a thoroughly optimistic and modern progressive.

I believe we can grow our economy in the face of global competition, and in a way that benefits all Americans.

I believe we can curb the excesses of the marketplace and provide more opportunities for more Americans to succeed.

I believe we can support and promote smart trade policies that truly enforce strong labor and environmental standards.

CLINTON: I believe we can help more workers join unions to improve wages and conditions in our workplaces for jobs that cannot be shipped overseas.

I believe that, just as 20th-century progressives fought corruption with a new civil service, we can restore competence to the front lines of our government and ensure that we never, ever experience another Hurricane Katrina.

In short, I believe that our government can once again work for all Americans. It can promote the great American tradition of opportunity for all and special privileges for none.

Today I want to focus on how we ensure both strong economic growth and economic fairness.

Now, we have seen for more than a century that fairness doesn't just happen. It requires the right government policies. And no one should be surprised, human nature being what it is, people will go as far as they possibly can get away with.

The genius of the American economic in the 20th century was that it helped to counter that tendency for people to push as far as their own interests would take them so that we created a leveler playing field that benefited everyone.

Unfortunately, for the past six years it's as though we've gone back to the era of the robber barons. Year after year the president has handed out massive tax breaks to oil companies, no-bid contracts to Halliburton, tax incentives to corporations shipping jobs overseas, tax cut after tax cut to multimillionaires, while ignoring the needs and aspirations of tens of millions of working families.

And how has he paid for all of this largess? By running up record deficits. He has simply charged it to our national credit card and left our children and grandchildren to pay the bill.

In fact, every baby born today starts like with $29,000 of national debt on his or her tiny shoulders, the largest birth tax in our nation's history.

It's also important to understand these policies are consistent with the administration's theory about how we should manage our economy: leave it all up to the individual.

That's why they want to privatize Social Security and let individuals bear the risks. It's why their answer to the health care crisis is limited to creating health savings account, which allows the healthiest people to get the best deal, with little concern if the sickest get worse.

CLINTON: They call it the ownership society. But it's really the "on your own" society.

On the other hand, they protect the drug companies from competition, including from their own products coming back across the border from Canada. And they give health care companies a subsidy of more than $1,000 per person to compete with Medicare. That is hardly the free market at work.

As a result, too many of our families are left running in place or falling behind.

Health care premiums have gone up 87 percent since 2000; college costs up 40 percent since the 2000 school year. Gas prices have more than doubled. And I don't need to tell anyone that they're heading even higher today.

Wages and incomes are lagging so much that, after five years of overall growth, there's been a 4 percent increase in the percentage of workers falling below the poverty line, and a 4 percent increase in working families losing their health insurance.

It's like our middle-class and hardworking families are invisible to this president.

If you're a worker who can't organize for fair wages and safe working conditions, you're invisible.

If you're one of the over 45 million Americans who don't have health insurance, you're invisible, too.

If your company has shipped your job overseas and you don't know how to pay your bills, well, you're invisible.

If you drive up to the gas station and have to pay $3.20 or $3.30 a gallon to fill up your tank, you're invisible as well.

Well, you're not invisible to me. And we can't restore the American dream unless you're a very visible part of it.

It's time for a new beginning, for an end to government of the few, by the few and for the few, time to reject the idea of an "on your own" society and to replace it with shared responsibility for shared prosperity. I prefer a "we're all in it together" society.

Now, there is no greater force for economic growth than free markets, but markets work best with rules that promote our values, protect our workers and give all people a chance to succeed.

When we get our priorities in order and make the smart investments we need, the markets work well.

Some of you might remember that, while we began the 1990s with record deficits, we ended the decade with a balanced budget, a record surplus, higher wages for the middle class, and 22 million new jobs.

Now, of course, we can't simply recycle the policies that worked in the 1990s. These are different times.

But we can return to many of the principles that guided us then, the principles that have worked time and time again to build our economy, expand opportunity, and offer all Americans the chance to have that American dream which we promised.

Now, I'm the product of this chance. I grew up in a middle-class family in the middle of America in the middle of the last century.

CLINTON: My father came back from World War II after having served in the Navy, and he worked hard to build his small business. He believed that one should avoid being in debt at all costs, and instilled in me the importance of being responsible with a budget at an early age, a value I still hold dear today.

Like millions of other families, we worked hard, we saved and we invested. And together, our determination and work ethic helped to create the American middle class.

Now that middle class is under assault from global economic forces and wrongheaded economic policies. So I'm proposing a new progressive plan to restore that American dream and to give all Americans the chance to compete and prosper in the global economy.

Here's what I believe we should do.

First, I'm going to work to level the playing field and reduce the special breaks for big corporations. We say this in every campaign. We make a little bit of progress. And then unfortunately, when the Republicans get back in office, they reverse everything we've done and add to the corporate welfare.

Well, I think we're going to have a better shot this time...

(APPLAUSE)

... because we're going to make it an issue in this campaign. We're going to ask people who are running for Congress to sign up one way or the other: Are they for corporate welfare, or are they for the average American having a decent shot at the American dream?

And there's a lot we could do right now.

You know, I believe that if we did give Medicare the chance to negotiate with drug companies, we would save $10 billion to $15 billion a year. Why should the drug companies be immune from the process that goes on every day in America, where you bargain for the best deal you can get? And we need to give our government that opportunity to do so.

When Bill was president, he gave it to the V.A., which is one of the reasons why the V.A. has the lowest drug prices in America today. Bargaining really does make a difference.

CLINTON: We also need...

(APPLAUSE)

... to require the big oil companies that are making the largest profits in the history of the world to invest in alternative energy themselves or pay into a fund to spur clean energy research and development. And there are many other examples that we could all give about how to zero in on corporate welfare.

Second, let's once and for all get rid of the incentives for American companies to ship jobs and profits overseas. It is one thing for the marketplace to encourage overseas investment. It's another for our own tax code to do so.

But that's exactly what is happening. Today, American companies that ship jobs overseas don't have to pay a penny in American taxes on the profits they make abroad unless they bring those profits back to the United States. And, of course, they don't bring them back because they don't want to pay taxes on them.

It's estimated this policy costs us billions of dollars each year in lost tax revenues. Even worse, we actually put companies that want to create jobs here on our shores at a disadvantage to those who ship jobs to tax havens.

Now, when I'm president we're going to reward decisions to create jobs here at home. We will consider eliminating the deduction for the actual costs of moving jobs.

These are decisions that, if there's going to be a level playing field, there should be no advantage given to anyone who takes a job and sends it overseas at the disadvantage of our workforce.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Third, let's reform the governance of our corporations and our financial sector. If you have any doubt about whether corporate governance impacts ordinary Americans, just think back to what happened at Enron, where thousands of workers lost much of their retirement savings.

The way I see it, allowing CEOs to escape with golden parachutes while their companies abandon workers' pensions does not honor our values.

We need to open up CEO compensation to public scrutiny and public challenge and ensure that boards of directors are independent when determining CEO pay. And we need to update our regulations to confront the emerging problems in our subprime and private equity markets.

Fourth, let's restore fiscal responsibility to our government. Let's get back to balanced budgets and save Social Security instead of running up our deficits.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, people ask me all the time, "Why can't we get tough on China?" Well, the answer is, because China is one of our bankers. We're their debtor. How can we truly enforce trade laws against a country that manipulates its currency and puts us at an unfair advantage when our economic stability depends on China's massive loans to us every single day?

And when the president's irresponsible tax breaks for high-income Americans expire, we will return to the income tax rates for upper-income Americans that we had in the 1990s, rates that were consistent with a balanced budget and economic growth.

For middle-class Americans, who haven't seen their paychecks increase, let's keep the middle-class tax cuts and reform the alternative minimum tax in order to give middle-class Americans the tax relief they deserve to have.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: And let's take a hard look at corporate tax reform. It's simply not fair that as corporate profits have skyrocketed, the percentage of taxes paid by corporations have fallen.

It's time we restored the balance and required corporations to pay their fair share. Under the law, after all, they are citizens of the United States, with many of the responsibilities, I would argue, that goes with citizenship.

Fifth, let's recommit ourselves to the idea that every young person in America who wants to should have the opportunity to attend college, and that a 21st-century education starts early in life and continues well into adulthood.

(APPLAUSE)

We know that having the most skilled, educated workforce in the world is key to our future success. That starts at the very beginning, with access to universal pre-kindergarten: high-quality learning opportunities for every 4-year-old in America. And I've laid out a proposal that would do exactly that.

We know that pre-kindergarten keeps kids in school longer, keeps them out of trouble, gives them more incentive to be academically interested and that it is a good payoff for our country: For every dollar invested, we get a $7 return.

The alternative is to pay costs in other ways. A startling fact is that some states in our country, when they're planning how many prison beds they need, look at third-grade test scores. And they extrapolate from the number of children who are failing in third-grade reading as to how many prison beds they'll need.

CLINTON: That's a lot more expensive than providing pre-kindergarten to those same children to hopefully keep them out of our prisons.

We also have to do more to raise up the opportunity for young people from middle-class and working families and poor families to be able to go to college.

You know, 75 percent of students at America's elite colleges come from the top 25 percent of the income bracket, just 3 percent from the bottom 25 percent.

We've got to make college affordable again, and that means everything from increasing Pell grants to changing the way college loans are provided and cleaning up the college loan industry from all of the scandals that is besetting it. Because if we don't make college affordable, we are seeing the results: Young people can't go.

The last time I was in Manchester I was talking with some of the teachers from one of the high schools here who told me that many young people were just really confused because they didn't have the money to go to college, and they didn't know what they were going to do. So we've got to do a better job than that.

Sixth, for those who don't attend four-year colleges and those in the workforce who need to update their skills, let's provide more support for schools like this and for community colleges that prepare people for good, high-paying jobs.

And let's provide wage insurance for our workers so that if you lose your job because of our trade policies, you can get the training and support you need for a new and better job.

There are a lot of jobs in our country that are going begging because we don't have the people with the skills to be able to fill those jobs.

Two examples.

We will need 35,000 automotive mechanics every year from now until 2010.

CLINTON: Automotive Retailing Today reports that we have 37,000 vacancies for mechanics right now. These jobs pay salaries up to $70,000 a year. And employers are aggressively recruiting talented high school graduates to fill these positions.

I met recently with the Machinists Union. They were telling me the same story about airline mechanics. They have hundreds of good jobs that they can't fill.

It's not just that we can't fill these jobs; it's that we've come to a point in our society where, frankly, we don't show the respect that these jobs should demand.

And this is something...

(APPLAUSE)

... this is something I feel very strongly about. We have sent a message to our young people, that if you don't go to college and you don't have a high-paying job, something like a basketball player or an entertainer or maybe someone in a corporation, that you're thought less of in America.

We have to stop this. Our country cannot run without the people who do the skills that are taught in this school. And it is time we begin to reverse the attitude that I think for too long has prevailed.

Which is why I'm so pleased that Governor Lynch will be adding to the money available through the state for technology and other kinds of advanced degree learning that can give young people a belief that doing these jobs is important.

As senator, I championed regional skills alliances that support employers in the same geographic region and industry. They support employers who pool their resources and broaden opportunities so employees can get the training they need in today's economy.

Those 1,200 people who come at night: That's what they're doing. They're trying to get additional skills that will enable them to fill jobs that already exist in this region.

And we're going to create more jobs and more regional skills alliances when I'm president.

Seventh, let's ensure that people who work hard every day can support their families and save for the future. I do not believe anyone who works full-time in America should draw a wage that puts that person below the poverty line.

If you're a full-time worker, you should make more than poverty.

(APPLAUSE)

Now that we've finally increased the minimum wage, let's expand and simplify the earned income tax credit so no one working full-time lives in poverty.

Let's also finally overhaul our unemployment insurance program.

Today's unemployment benefits aren't even enough to keep an average family above the poverty line. And many workers in today's economy, including part-time and self-employed workers, are still ineligible for unemployment insurance.

You know, our unemployment system has hardly changed at all over the last 70 years. And yet we know a lot of employers don't want to give people full-time jobs. They only give them part-time jobs, so they don't have to pay for benefits.

So when someone is laid off or loses that part-time job, under our existing system, even though it was all they could get, they're not eligible for unemployment insurance help.

So I'm hoping that we can do a better job, by looking at our unemployment system and bringing it into the modern age.

I think we also have to have a modern attitude toward unions. You know, we know that unionized workers make 30 percent more than workers who aren't in unions. But today, just 7 percent of our workforce in the private sector is unionized.

CLINTON: We need to give workers more of the benefits that come with union membership. Let's pass the Employee Free Choice Act to make sure that unions can organize for fair wages and safe working conditions. Let's appoint people to the Department of Labor who are truly pro-labor.

That would be an unusual idea, don't you think?

(APPLAUSE)

Unions played a critical role in building the middle class. And I don't think it's a coincidence that as union membership has dropped, middle-class incomes have stagnated.

So this is not an either/or choice. We can have both.

Some people say, "Well, if you have more unionization that will make America uncompetitive." But there are other countries in the global economy that pay wages equal to or higher than ours, and many jobs that are important to the economy in those countries demand a really good living wage for a middle-class family.

Their lower-paid workers are paid more than our lower-paid workers. But their higher-paid workers are paid less. So there's less of a gap between our lower-paid workers and our highest-paid workers, which means that there's more money for those wage increases in the middle.

That's what worked for America until relatively recently. And that's what we have to persuade people is good for America again.

Eighth, let's ensure everyone has the most fundamental benefit there is: quality, affordable health care. Now, we know that this is going to be challenging. But if we could spend more than $500 billion to fund the war in Iraq, we can surely make the basic investments to ensure that every American can see a doctor when he or she needs to.

(APPLAUSE)

Ninth and finally, let's make the investments we need to create the millions of good jobs necessary to lift up all of our families. To preserve and expand the middle class in an open, global economy, we have to have a source of good new jobs every five to eight years. Telecom did that during the '90s.

In this decade, that means an all-out commitment to a clean, independent energy future. Now, I'll be talking a lot more about investing in alternative energy and energy efficiency. Because we know that alternative energy isn't just good for our national security -- and we know that it's imperative for our environment and to tackle global warming -- but it is also good for our economy.

CLINTON: By working to break our addiction to foreign oil and investing in clean-energy technology, we can create good new jobs right here in America.

When I was in up in Berlin, they were hoping that we could take those old paper and pulp mills and turn them into energy creators by using wood. So instead of using wood for the purposes that it's been harvested in New Hampshire for hundreds of years, you would use it for creating energy.

Well, these are the kinds of new jobs that we need to be looking for across our country.

I also believe we have to invest in 21st-century infrastructure to compete. Let's set a goal of putting high-speed Internet access through broadband or wireless within the reach of every single American so that people throughout this state and every other one will be able to participate in the global economy.

In New York, as a senator, I've done a lot of work trying to work with chambers of commerce and others to create zones for access to high-speed Internet, because it was difficult to attract jobs to the Adirondacks or to other areas of rural New York without having that.

We haven't had much help from the federal government, but I've been introducing legislation every since I arrived in the Senate to do just that.

Just as we had a railroad system that connected our country, an electrification system, an interstate highway system, an airport system, we have to have a broadband system.

And, unfortunately, other countries are gaining on us and surpassing us, and that gives them economic advantages.

I also am not giving up on manufacturing.

CLINTON: I believe we can still have a vibrant manufacturing base, with the right policies. It provides an immediate laboratory for innovation and a challenging feedback loop for engineers, designers and dreamers. It's an invaluable training ground for a new generation of entrepreneurs and leaders.

That's why I helped to start the Senate Manufacturing Caucus, where I've worked to develop a manufacturing strategy that will be suitable with the challenges of the 21st century.

I also founded a group called New Jobs for New York, a unique non-profit that harnesses the ingenuity, entrepreneurship and hard work of New Yorkers. And I want to do that across our country.

You know, we've been able to show companies in New York they didn't need to leave our country in order to get qualified people to do the work.

We also commissioned a study which proved the cost of moving jobs to other countries is a lot greater than people actually understand or realize.

So there's a lot we can do to give us a source of new jobs and to have an innovation agenda that will make us competitive going forward. We can't do it if we just accept the Republican policies or if we just believe America's best days are over.

You know, a lot of people around the world are writing America off. They do believe our best days are behind us. I could not disagree more.

I believe America can rebound from these last six years.

I believe we can restore fairness and ensure that all share in our prosperity.

I believe we can reduce the deficit and restore fiscal responsibility and give people the education and opportunities they need to fulfill their God-given potentials.

I'm running for president because I believe if we set big goals and we work together to achieve them, we can restore the American dream today and for the next generation.

The core ideals of a 21st-century progressivism are simple. The foundation of a strong economy is the investments we make in each other: in education, health care, clean energy and new technologies. Greatness comes from policies that promote prosperity and ensure we all share in it.

Now, living up to these ideals and changing the political makeup will not be easy. But I'm absolutely confident we can do it.

And I would just close by thinking of that Granite Stater Daniel Webster. He said it years ago when he urged us to "develop the resources of our land, call forth its powers, build up its institutions, promote all its great interests and see whether we also, in our day and generation, may not perform something worthy to be remembered."

I'm confident we have the discipline, the determination and the drive that we will not be the first generation in American history to leave our country worse off than when we found it.

But we will continue, as every generation has before, to create much that is worthy to be remembered. We will restore fairness and responsibility to our economy, rebuild our middle class and rise to the challenges of this new global century.

Thank you all very much.

(APPLAUSE)

DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES PARTICIPATE IN A DEBATE SPONSORED BY CNN, 6/3/2007

SPRADLING: Senator Obama, you get the first question of the night.

It has been nearly six years since 9/11. Since that time, we have not suffered any terrorist attacks on U.S. soil. Just yesterday, the FBI arrested three men for a terror plot at JFK Airport.

Could it be that the Bush administration's effort to thwart terror at home has been a success?

OBAMA: No. Look, all of us are glad that we haven't had a terrorist attack since 9/11, and I think there's some things that the Bush administration has done well.

But the fact of the matter is that we live in a more dangerous world, not a less dangerous world, partly as a consequence of this president's actions.

Primarily because of this war in Iraq, a war that I think should have never been authorized or waged, what we've seen is a distraction from the battle to deal with Al Qaida in Afghanistan. We have created an entire new recruitment network in Iraq that we're seeing them send folks to Lebanon and Jordan and other areas of the region.

And so one of the things that I think is critical as the next president is to make absolutely certain that we not only phase out the war in Iraq, but we also focus on the critical battle that we have in Afghanistan and rout out Al Qaida.

OBAMA: If we do not do that, then we're going to potentially see another attack here in the United States.

BLITZER: Does the Bush administration, Senator, deserve any credit for the fact there has been no terrorist attack here in the United States for nearly six years?

OBAMA: You know, I think there are some things they've done well. I think they've cracked down on some of the financial networks. I think that is important.

They have, unfortunately, not strengthened our alliances with other countries. And one of the most important things that we're going to have to do to be successful in routing out these networks is to make sure that we have the cooperation of other nations.

That is not something that we've done. And the effort in Iraq has greatly weakened our efforts there.

BLITZER: Senator Edwards, let me let you clarify what you said the other day. You said the war on terror is a bumper sticker, not a plan.

With the news yesterday, this alleged plot at JFK which could have done, supposedly, horrendous damage and caused an incredible number of casualties, do you believe the U.S. is not at war with terrorists?

EDWARDS: I reject this bumper sticker, Wolf. And that's exactly what it is. It's a bumper sticker.

As president of the United States, I will do absolutely everything to find terrorists where they are, to stop them before they can do harm to us, before they can do harm to America or to its allies.

Every tool available -- military alliances, intelligence -- I will use.

But what this global war on terror bumper sticker -- political slogan, that's all it is, all it's ever been -- was intended to do was for George Bush to use it to justify everything he does: the ongoing war in Iraq, Guantanamo, Abu Ghraib, spying on Americans, torture.

None of those things are OK. They are not the United States of America.

BLITZER: All right.

Senator Clinton, do you agree with Senator Edwards that this war on terror is nothing more than a bumper sticker; at least the way it's been described?

CLINTON: No, I do not. I am a senator from New York. I have lived with the aftermath of 9/11, and I have seen firsthand the terrible damage that can be inflicted on our country by a small band of terrorists who are intent upon foisting their way of life and using suicide bombers and suicidal people to carry out their agenda.

And I believe we are safer than we were. We are not yet safe enough. And I have proposed over the last year a number of policies that I think we should following.

BLITZER: Congressman Kucinich, you voted against the Patriot Act when it was first introduced. You've since voted again against it. But some would say yesterday's plot that was described by the FBI underscores the need for precisely that kind of tough measure to deal with potential terrorists out there.

KUCINICH: Benjamin Franklin once said that those who would give up their essential liberties to achieve a sense of security deserve neither.

KUCINICH: The Patriot Act has undermined civil rights in this country. And as president of the United States, one of my first acts in office will be to move forward to have the Justice Department overturn the Patriot Act as unconstitutional.

We have to remember that 9/11 led us down a cul de sac. Americans need to reconnect with our deepest sense of self here, Wolf. We have to remember that, you know, the courage that it took to form this country is still within us.

And I want to have what I call the 9/10 forum to recreate -- help us reconnect with the deeper sense of who we are as Americans.

BLITZER: We've got to move on to the next question. I want to go back to Scott.

Go ahead, Scott.

SPRADLING: Thanks, Wolf.

Senator Biden...

BIDEN: Yes, sir.

SPRADLING: Question for you on Iraq: You are the only person standing on this stage tonight to recently vote to continue funding the troops in Iraq.

My question is this. Why were Senators Obama, Clinton, Dodd, and Congressman Kucinich wrong to vote against the funding?

BIDEN: I'm not going to make a judgment on why they were wrong. I'll tell you why I was right.

No one has fought harder to change this president's policy.

Matter of fact, the very language that was vetoed in the bill was language that I, along with Senator Levin, put in, and I've suggested over a year ago in a proposal I laid forward. That is to start to draw down troops immediately, have them all out by '08.

But, you know, the fact of the matter is: It's about time. We've not been told the truth about this war from the beginning by this president. And the fact is, we got to tell the truth now.

The truth now is, there are 160,000 forces in Iraq. They're in harm's way. Seventy percent of all the injuries are caused by land -- those IEDs.

We know that if we put in these mine-resistant vehicles, the V- shaped-hull vehicles, put them in now, we could save two-third of the lives and two-thirds of the injuries.

BIDEN: My colleagues joined me when I proposed fast-forwarding the funding for that so we could get 2,500 of them into the field by August. If we had voted no and stopped this, it would have delayed that. Lives are at stake.

And I knew the right political vote, but I tell you what: Some things are worth losing elections over.

BLITZER: Senator Biden, why are you reluctant to say now: They were wrong, and you were right?

BIDEN: Because I don't want to judge them. I mean, these are my friends. We have worked together. We've worked hard to try and end this war. We have people telling everybody: Just stop the war, Congress. We have 50 votes. We're busting our neck every single day. So I respect it.

But look, I cannot -- as long as there is a single troop in Iraq that I know if I take action by funding them, I increase the prospect they will live or not be injured -- I cannot and will not vote no to fund them.

BLITZER: Senator Clinton, you voted in favor of every funding for the U.S. troops since the start of the war until now. And some are accusing you and some others of playing politics with the lives of the troops.

What is your response?

CLINTON: Well, I have the deepest respect for my friend, Senator Biden, and he and I have agreed on much of what we have attempted to do.

Unfortunately, we don't have a president who is willing to change course. And I think it was time to say enough is enough.

I thought the best way to support our troops was to try to send a very strong message that they should begin to come home. That is the best way to support them. And I thought that vote was an opportunity to do so.

Everybody on this stage, we are all united, Wolf. We all believe that we need to try to end this war. In two nights you're going to have the Republican candidates here. They all support the war. They all support the president. They all supported the escalation. Each of us is trying in our own way to bring the war to an end.

BLITZER: Senator Obama, you did the same thing. Since you came into the Senate, you voted for the funding for the troops for this war until now.

What's your answer?

OBAMA: Wolf, look, everybody supports the troops. And everybody knows that.

To some degree, this was a vote that had to do with how we feel about a continuation of a plan that has not worked.

The president has now announced -- just the other day, he said that this was like Korea. Keep in mind, we've been there six decades in the Korean Peninsula.

And the best way for us to support the troops is to ensure that we are not continuing to try to impose a military solution on what is essentially a political problem in Iraq.

And that's why I put forward a bill that would begin a phased redeployment and have all our troops out by March 31st of next year.

BLITZER: I'm going to come to Governor Richardson in a moment.

But, Senator Edwards, where, if at all, do you disagree with any of your Democratic colleagues -- Democratic candidates -- on this issue of the troops, the funding of the war, how to get out?

EDWARDS: Well, I think it's the difference between leading and following.

I think Hillary's right. All of us do want to end this war. But I have made very clear from the outset that the way to end the war is for the Congress to use its constitutional authority to fund. They should send a bill to the president with a timetable for withdrawal, which they did.

The president vetoed. And then it came back. And then it was the moment of truth.

And I said throughout the lead-up to this vote that I was against a funding bill that did not have a timetable for withdrawal, that it was critical for the Congress to stand firm. They were given a mandate by the American people.

And others on this stage -- Chris Dodd spoke out very loudly and clearly. But I want to finish this -- others did not. Others were quiet. They went quietly to the floor of the Senate, cast the right vote. But there is a difference between leadership and legislating.

BLITZER: You want to name names?

EDWARDS: No, I think it's obvious who I'm talking about.

BLITZER: It is to me, but it might not be to some of the viewers out there.

EDWARDS: Senator Clinton and Senator Obama did not say anything about how they were going to vote until they appeared on the floor of the Senate and voted. They were among the last people to vote. And I think that the importance of this is -- they cast the right vote, and I applaud them for that. But the importance of this is, they're asking to be president of the United States.

And there is a difference between making clear, speaking to your followers, speaking to the American people about what you believe needs to be done. And I think all of us have a responsibility to lead on these issues, not just on Iraq, but on health care, on energy, on all the other issues.

BLITZER: I'm going to give both of them a chance to respond to you.

Senator Obama?

OBAMA: Well, look, the -- I think it is important to lead. And I think John -- the fact is is that I opposed this war from the start. So you're about four and a half years late on leadership on this issue. And, you know, I think it's important not to play politics on something that is as critical and as difficult as this.

Now, the fact of the matter is, Joe has a legitimate perspective.

OBAMA: It is not easy to vote for cutting off funding, because the fact is there are troops on the ground. And I'll let Hillary speak for herself, but the fact of the matter is that all of us exercised our best judgment, just as we exercised our best judgment to authorize or not authorize this war. And I think it's important for us to be clear about that.

BLITZER: All right.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: And I think it's important particularly to point out: This is George Bush's war. He is responsible for this war. He started the war. He mismanaged the war. He escalated the war. And he refuses to end the war.

And what we are trying to do, whether it's by speaking out from the outside or working and casting votes that actually make a difference from the inside, we are trying to end the war.

And each of us has made that very clear. We have different approaches. I have a three-step plan to bring the troops home starting now, put pressure on the Iraqi government to take responsibility and cut off aid when they won't, and engage in intensive diplomacy, regionally and internationally.

BLITZER: All right.

CLINTON: The differences among us are minor. The differences between us and the Republicans are major. And I don't want anybody in America to be confused.

BLITZER: Let me let Senator Edwards respond. Are the differences minor between you and these Democratic candidates?

EDWARDS: There are differences between us. And I think Democratic voters deserve to know the differences between us.

I think there is a difference between making very clear, when the crucial moment comes, on Congress ending this war, what your position is, and standing quiet. That's all I'm saying.

BLITZER: All right.

EDWARDS: They eventually voted the right way. I respect them for voting the right way. But there are important differences between us on this. And the voters are entitled to know that.

BLITZER: All right. Senator Dodd -- he voted against the funding as well.

Senator?

DODD: Well, first of all, let me thank John Edwards for the nice compliment. I appreciate that...

(LAUGHTER)

... in the midst of all this.

Wolf, the first responsibility, and the first priority of an American president is to keep our country safe and secure.

DODD: This policy in Iraq has failed. It is a civil war. Everyone who has looked at this issue has drawn the conclusion that there is no military solution to it.

It seems to me then it's incumbent upon us -- given the fact that we are less safe, less secure, more vulnerable, weaker today, not stronger as a result of this policy -- that we ought to try to bring it to a close.

So I thought the right thing to do was to pursue and push this issue of having a date certain or it tied to funding. It's very, very important, so that we have the ability to move beyond this.

This war has caused many casualties, not the least of which are our troops, obviously, but also the foreign policy. Your first question on terror has been directly affected because of this policy in Iraq.

BLITZER: Governor Richardson, I want Governor Richardson to weigh in because I know you have been very concerned about what is happening with the genocide in Darfur.

What if some of the critics, some of the supporters of this war, are right, and a unilateral, quick U.S. withdrawal from Iraq -- and you want troops out by the end of this year -- does lead not only to an increased civil war, but to genocide in Iraq?

BLITZER: What moral responsibility does the United States have to deal with that scenario?

RICHARDSON: I've spent a lot of time in this region. I was U.N. ambassador. Eighty percent of my time was spent on the Iraq issue. I've talked to the leaders there.

And there is a fundamental difference between my position and the position of my good friends here. I believe that it's a civil war. I believe that there is sectarian conflict already. There is enormous turmoil.

Seven Americans died today.

This is what I would do. I would have a resolution under Article I to deauthorize the war, to move forward with a timetable, the end of this calendar year...

BLITZER: But what about genocide? What about the possibility of genocide?

RICHARDSON: ... no residual -- no residual forces.

I think there has to be pointed out a difference in our approach. Obviously, genocide is something in Darfur. You know, I have been involved in that issue.

RICHARDSON: I believe what we need to do there is stop this genocide. Why don't we care about Africa?

BLITZER: What about Iraq, if it were, God forbid, to happen?

RICHARDSON: Well, obviously, I would keep troops in Kuwait, where they are wanted. I would move them to Afghanistan to fight Al Qaida.

But I believe that our troops have become a target. Our troops right now have done a magnificent job.

And so what -- the difference between all of us here is this: All of these resolutions, the funding -- supplemental appropriation on funding, on issues relating to timetables is not working because the president is vetoing.

BLITZER: All right...

RICHARDSON: Let me finish.

BLITZER: Hold on one second. We're going to get back to this. We're going to get back to this. I want to let Senator Gravel -- he hasn't had a chance to speak yet.

Senator Gravel, I know you've been outspoken on all of these issues. Where, very briefly, do you disagree with these other Democratic candidates?

GRAVEL: Totally. Totally. It's just that simple.

Four of these people here will say that it's George Bush's war. It was facilitated by the Democrats.

GRAVEL: They brought the resolution up. One of them authored, co-authored it here, standing here.

And so it's -- sure, it's George Bush's war. But it's the Democrats' war also.

Now that you want to end it, you're concerned about what's going to happen after we withdraw. Remember Vietnam. All the dominoes are going to fall. Southeast Asia's going to go -- is going to go Communist.

Well, how do we know what will happen? I do know this, that the insurgency is successful because the population sustains that insurgency, period.

BLITZER: All right.

Let's go to the next question from Tom.

Go ahead, Tom.

FAHEY: Yes, thank you.

Congressman Kucinich...

CLINTON: It's hard to hear you.

FAHEY: OK.

I'll yell. I don't think the mike is working.

BLITZER: Go ahead.

FAHEY: The New Hampshire Union Leader asked readers to e-mail questions for the candidates...

KUCINICH: I can't...

BLITZER: I don't know if we're having trouble with his mike.

I'll read you his question.

KUCINICH: Yeah, go ahead.

BLITZER: The Union Leader, the main newspaper here in New Hampshire, asked readers to e-mail their questions.

Here's one from Michael Pelletier (ph), a major in the New Hampshire National Guard: "Can you tell me if the mission we accomplished during our deployment in Iraq was worth our effort and sacrifice, or was it a waste of time and resources?"

KUCINICH: I honor the people who served. We all owe them a debt of gratitude. But those who sent those soldiers were wrong. They should have never been sent there in the first place, Wolf.

This war has been based on lies. And we could have a productive evening here right now if all of my colleagues on this stage or in the Congress would commit to telling the Democratic leadership not even to offer a funding bill, because that's really the way to end the war, Wolf.

Just say, no money. The war is over. You want to end it? Bring them home. Stop the funding. And this is where Senator Clinton says, well, this is George Bush's war.

Oh, no. There's a teachable moment here.

KUCINICH: And the teachable moment is that this war belongs to the Democratic Party because the Democrats were put in charge by the people in the last election with the thought that they were going to end the war.

Well, they haven't. They have to stop the funding. And I certainly am urging all of my colleagues here, don't give him any more money. The money's in the pipeline right now, enough to bring the troops home. Let's end the war and let's make this a productive evening.

BLITZER: Senator Biden?

BIDEN: Wolf, look, the Republicans and this president have not told us the truth about this war from the beginning. The last thing we Democrats should do is not be telling the truth.

We have 50 votes in the United States Senate. We have less of a majority in the House than any time other than the last eight years.

Ladies and gentlemen, you're going to end this war when you elect a Democratic president. You need 67 votes to end this war.

I love these guys who tell you they're going to stop the war. Let me tell you straight up the truth. The truth of the matter is, the only one that's emboldened the enemy has been George Bush by his policies, not us funding the war.

BIDEN: We're funding the safety of those troops there until we can get 67 votes...

BLITZER: All right. Hold on, hold on. I want to bring Senator Clinton in.

Senator Clinton, do you regret voting the authorize the president to use force against Saddam Hussein in Iraq without actually reading the national intelligence estimate, the classified document laying out the best U.S. intelligence at that time?

CLINTON: Wolf, I was thoroughly briefed. I knew all the arguments. I knew all of what the Defense Department, the CIA, the State Department were all saying. And I sought dissenting opinions, as well as talking to people in previous administrations and outside experts.

You know, that was a sincere vote based on my assessment that sending inspectors back into Iraq to determine once and for all whether Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction and using coercive diplomacy was not an unreasonable act.

What I did not count on, and what none of us did who voted to give the president authority, is that he had no intention to allow the inspectors to finish their job.

CLINTON: Now, we can argue about the past, or we can answer the question you asked about the National Guard. Our troops did the job they were asked to do. They got rid of Saddam Hussein. They conducted the search for weapons of mass destruction. They gave the Iraqi people a chance for elections and to have a government. It is the Iraqis who have failed to take advantage of that opportunity.

BLITZER: So let me just be precise, because the question was: Do you regret not reading the national intelligence estimate?

CLINTON: I feel like I was totally briefed. I knew all of the arguments that were being made by everyone from all directions. National intelligence estimates have a consensus position and then they have argumentation as to those people who don't agree with it. I thought the best way to find out who was right in the intelligence community was to send in the inspectors.

If George Bush had allowed the inspectors to finish the job they started, we would have known that Saddam Hussein did not have WMD and we would not have gone and invaded Iraq.

BLITZER: Senator Edwards, you didn't read that national intelligence estimate either. Do you regret that?

EDWARDS: No, actually, I think that I would agree with some of what Hillary just said. I think it's true that I was on the Intelligence Committee -- and I don't think Senator Clinton was, but

I was on the Intelligence Committee. I received direct information from that. I met with former high-level people in the Clinton administration who gave me additional information. And I read the summary of the NIE.

I think I had the information I needed. I don't think that was the question.

I think one difference we do have is I think I was wrong. I should never have voted for this war.

And this goes to the issue that Senator Obama raised a few minutes ago. He deserves credit for being against this war from the beginning. He was right. I was wrong.

(APPLAUSE)

And I think it is important for anybody who seeks to be the next president of the United States, given the dishonesty that we've been faced with over the last several years, to be honest to the country.

EDWARDS: We have to re-establish trust between the American people and the president.

BLITZER: All right.

EDWARDS: And that's going to require any of us who want to be president to be open and honest with the American people.

BLITZER: Senator Obama, you didn't think the war was the right thing to do, even though you weren't in the U.S. Senate. You didn't have access to any intelligence information at the time.

Do you think someone who authorized the use of force to go to war in Iraq should be president of the United States?

OBAMA: I don't think it's a disqualifier. I think that people were making their best judgments at the time.

I will say on the National Intelligence Estimate that Chairman Graham -- Bob Graham of Florida, who at the time was the head of the Intelligence Committee -- cited that specifically as one of the reasons that he voted against it.

So obviously there was some pertinent information there.

I appreciate John's compliment.

When I looked at the issue, what I saw was a weak case on the part of this administration, the sort of fear-mongering that I think, John, you've referred on this stage tonight.

OBAMA: And the critical thing for us moving forward is to recognize that we are not going to be able to continue to throw our troops at a civil war and be able to succeed.

And I just have to go back to what I said earlier. This is an enormous distraction from the battle that does have to be waged in Afghanistan in rooting out Al Qaida. That is something that we have failed to do. We have the opportunity to be successful there. But we have to finish the job.

BLITZER: Senator Gravel, do you think someone who voted to authorize the president to go to war should be president of the United States?

GRAVEL: Not at all, because it's a moral criteria.

And there's information coming out -- Senator Durbin, Mr. Shrum, in his book -- that really points out that these people knew that there was two sets of intelligence going on at the same time. And they made a political decision to vote the way they voted, a political decision that cost -- stop and think. We have killed more Americans than was done on the 11th of September.

BLITZER: When you...

GRAVEL: More Americans died because of their decision. That disqualifies them for president. It doesn't mean they're bad people. It just means that they don't have moral judgment. And that's very important when you become president.

BLITZER: All right.

Senator Clinton, you want to respond?

CLINTON: Well, I have said repeatedly that if I had known then what I know now, I never would have voted to give the president authority.

And in the last debate, I said that, you know, it was a mistake to trust George Bush that he would do what he told all of us he would do.

He made it in speeches, he told us in private that he would put the inspectors in to determine whether or not the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Clinton administration, many other countries who thought that there were stores of chemical and biological weapons were true or not.

Now, I do not think that that is a necessarily wrong judgment at the time.

What was wrong is the way this president misused the authority...

BLITZER: All right.

CLINTON: ... that some of us here gave him.

CLINTON: And that has been a tragedy.

BLITZER: We have to move on to the next question. I want to go back to Tom.

Tom, hopefully you're microphone is working.

FAHEY: Yes, I'm hoping, too.

Governor Richardson, a question on immigration. Despite your doubts about the immigration bill that's now pending in the U.S. Senate, you support granting legal status to about 12 million people who have entered this country illegally.

Why is this not an amnesty program?

BLITZER: All right. I don't know if all the candidates could hear your microphone, so I'm going to re-read his question to make sure all of you heard it.

The question is directed to Governor Richardson.

Governor Richardson, despite your doubts about the immigration bill pending in the Senate, you support granting legal status to roughly 12 million people who entered the United States illegally.

Why is this not an amnesty program?

RICHARDSON: I'm a border governor.

RICHARDSON: Two years ago, I declared a border emergency because of the tremendous flow of drugs and illegal workers coming into my state.

I deal with this issue every day.

Here's my position: I would not support legislation that divided families; I would not support legislation that builds a wall, a Berlin-type wall, between two countries the way the bill in the Congress exists today.

Now, what are the essential components of any good, sensible immigration bill?

One, increases border patrols; double the size of border patrols and technology. That makes sense. Don't reduce the National Guard that's there.

Secondly, an earned legalization program -- yes, I support that -- one that is based on learning English, paying back taxes, passing a background check, getting behind those that are trying to get here legally, obeying laws, embracing American values.

RICHARDSON: And then, lastly, finding ways that we penalize employers that knowingly hire illegal workers. That is essential in an immigration bill.

BLITZER: Let me get back to the question. Almost all of these 12 million illegal immigrants who are here would qualify for this new Z visa, which would make them legal residents of the United States. So here is the question: Why isn't this amnesty?

RICHARDSON: It isn't an amnesty...

BLITZER: Why?

RICHARDSON: ...because what this bill does is it sets standards, the standards that I mentioned: learning English, passing background checks. There is a touch-back provision. The head-of-household has to go back and then apply. I believe that is unworkable, too. It divides families. But you don't immediately get an amnesty. You don't immediately get citizenship. It is a process that takes about 13 years.

Now, I commend the Congress for facing up to having a legalization plan, but I will not support a bill -- our immigration laws in this country always bring families together. together.

RICHARDSON: This separates families.

BLITZER: All right.

RICHARDSON: There's also a provision -- this is important -- that involves -- that involves guest workers. They should have labor protections.

BLITZER: All right.

RICHARDSON: We don't want to create a permanent underclass in those workers.

BLITZER: Senator Biden, let me let you weigh in. You voted last year to support this immigration legislation, including the construction of an approximately 700-mile fence along the border between the United States and Mexico.

Governor Richardson doesn't think there needs to be such a fence. Why is he wrong?

BIDEN: Well, he's not wrong. There doesn't need to be a 700- mile fence. But there does need -- look, we ought to start -- we all love this phrase: Start talking truth to power.

Fourteen million illegals: Now, you tell me how many buses, carloads, planes -- they're going to go out and round up all these people, spend hundreds of millions and billions of dollars to do it, with the whole world watching, while we send these folks back.

Rather than get a background check on all of them, take out the criminals, get them back, and provide for a means by which we allowed earned citizenship over the next decade or so.

BIDEN: Folks, being commander in chief requires you to occasionally be practical.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: If you don't think there needs to be a fence, why did you vote for that legislation?

BIDEN: Well, that fence was -- the reason I voted for the fence was that was the only alternative that was there.

And I voted for the fence related to drugs. A fence will stop 20 kilos of cocaine coming through that fence. It will not stop someone climbing over it or around it.

And so -- but this bill has a much more reasonable provision in it. It has much -- a shorter fence. It does have the Border Patrol requirements. And it is designed not just to deal with illegals, it's designed with a serious drug trafficking problem we have.

BLITZER: Let me bring back Senator Obama.

You also voted for that legislation, including the construction of that fence. And some say, to be even-handed, if you want to build a fence along the border with Mexico, you should also build a fence along the border with Canada.

OBAMA: Well, we should certainly do a better job patrolling the borders in Canada. In fact, this recent case with the young lawyer who had tuberculosis being waved through by a border guard because he said he looked OK is a problem. And we've got to strengthen our border patrols on both sides.

But let's go back to the essential issue here. We are a country of immigrants. We're also a country of laws. And the question is, how do we balance that appropriately?

I am hopeful that we can solve this problem constructively. I think Joe is exactly right, that we want to have a situation in which those who are already here, are playing by the rules, are willing to pay a fine and go through a rigorous process, should have a pathway to legalization. And I think most Americans will support that if they have some sense that the border is also being secured.

What they don't want is a situation in which there is a pathway to legalization and you've got another several hundred thousands of folks coming in every year.

OBAMA: And that, I think...

BLITZER: All right.

OBAMA: ... is a sensible position we should be able to arrive at.

BLITZER: We're going to move on to the next question. But before we do, one related question. And I'm going to periodically ask you to raise your hand if you agree or you -- if you agree with the question. And I want you to raise your hand if you believe English should be the official language of the United States.

The only hand I see is Senator Gravel.

GRAVEL: Yeah. We speak English. That doesn't mean we can't encourage other languages. I speak French and English. People speak Spanish and English. But the official language of the United States of America is English.

OBAMA: Can I just make a point, though?

BLITZER: All right.

OBAMA: I have to say that that kind of question...

(APPLAUSE)

BLITZER: All right, hold on.

OBAMA: ... this is the kind of question that is designed precisely to divide us. You know, you're right. Everybody is going to learn to speak English if they live in this country. The issue is not whether or not future generations of immigrants are going to learn English. The question is: How can we come up with both a legal, sensible immigration policy?

OBAMA: And when we get distracted by those kinds of questions, I think we do a disservice to the American people.

(APPLAUSE)

BLITZER: All right. We're going to save our applause until the end, please.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Wolf, let me add that we faced that in the Senate last year as to whether we would or would not vote for it.

The problem is that if it becomes official instead of recognized as national -- which indeed it is, it is our national language -- if it becomes official, that means in a place like New York City you can't print ballots in any other language. That means you can't have government pay for translators in hospitals so when somebody comes in with some sort of emergency there's nobody there to help translate what their problem is for the doctor.

So many of us -- I did, at least -- voted to say that English was our national language, but not the official language because of the legal consequences of that.

BLITZER: Senator Dodd, you know most of the polls show an overwhelming majority of the American public favors making English the official language of the United States.

DODD: Well, I think the points that were made by Barack Obama and Hillary are very, very important here. This is the kind of question that does divide us.

Just a related point here: We need to be encouraging more language training in our country. At the time of the 9/11 attacks here, we had advertisements running in national newspapers for anybody who could speak Arabic, here.

We have too few of our people in our country that can understand second languages. This is the 21st century. This is a global economy. We need to encourage more diversity in that.

BLITZER: All right...

DODD: Certainly, we have a national language here. I speak fluent Spanish, along with Bill Richardson.

BLITZER: All right...

DODD: I'm proud of the fact I speak two languages. But we ought to be encouraging more of that in the country and not talking about how we have one official language in our nation. That's not helping our country.

BLITZER: All right. We're going to go on to the next question because our time is obviously limited.

Scott, go ahead.

SPRADLING: Thanks, Wolf.

Senator Edwards, question for you, sir. I was struck by your conversation that you had a moment ago about dishonesty in politics, and wanting to make things clear.

SPRADLING: This is a health care question for you, and really focusing on price tags here.

Governor Richardson, for example, says that you can fund health care meaningfully without raising taxes. Senator Clinton has said that she's not prepared to say she will raise taxes to reform health care. Your plan does raise some taxes to fund your universal health care program.

So I am wondering: From your perspective, are they being honest about the true costs of universal health care in America?

EDWARDS: Let me say, first, I think it's a very healthy thing that we have Democrats coming out with health care plans. This country's health care system is completely dysfunctional. I am proud of the fact that I was the first person to come out with a specific, truly universal health care plan.

Senator Obama came out with a plan just a few days ago, which I don't believe is completely universal, but he deserves to be credited because he laid out what the cost is, and exactly how he was going to pay for it.

I do believe that -- and by the way, you didn't say this, but my plan costs $90 billion to $120 billion a year.

EDWARDS: I'd pay for it by getting rid of Bush's tax cuts for people who make over $200,000 a year.

And I believe you cannot cover everybody in America, create a more efficient health care system, cover the cracks, you know, getting rid of things like pre-existing conditions and making sure that mental health is treated the same as physical health, I don't think you can do all those things for nothing. That's not the truth.

And I think people have been so sick of listening to politicians who come and say, "We're going to give you universal health care. We're going to change the way we use energy in America. We're going to strengthen the middle class, have middle class tax cuts, and, in the process, we're going to eliminate the federal deficit."

BLITZER: Thank you.

EDWARDS: That is not the truth. And we need to be honest with people about that.

BLITZER: Let me let Senator Obama weigh in, because you did release your plan, that Senator Edwards says is not really a universal health care plan because it isn't mandatory on everyone.

I wonder if you'd want to respond to that.

OBAMA: You just identified the basic disagreement with John and I.

By the way, I think John has a lot of good elements in his plan. And I think that as people release their plans, I think there's going to be a lot of overlap, which is a good thing.

But the main disagreement with John and I is John believes that we have to have mandatory insurance for everyone in order to have universal health care.

My belief is that most families want health care but they can't afford it. And so my emphasis is on driving down the costs, taking on the insurance companies, making sure that they are limited in the ability to extract profits and deny coverage; that we make sure the drug companies have to do what's right by their patients instead of simply hoarding their profits.

If we do those things, then I believe that we can drive down the costs for families. In fact, we've got very conservative, credible estimates that say we can save families that do have health insurance about a $1,000 a year. And we can also make sure that we provide coverage for everybody else. And we do provide mandatory health care for children.

BLITZER: Senator Clinton, you've been involved in this issue -- as all of us remember -- for a long time.

What do you think of Senator Obama's plan?

CLINTON: Well, I'm thrilled that universal health care is back on the national agenda. You know, as we remember, back in '93 and '94 we tried to come forward with a plan. We weren't successful. I have the scars to show for that experience.

But I am convinced that now when the Democrats all are coming forward saying, "This has to be a national goal," we then can try to get the political will.

The most important thing is not the plan. Because there are only a few ways to do this. And we're all talking pretty much about the same things. From my perspective, we have to lower cost, improve quality and cover everybody.

What's important, and what I learned in the previous effort is you've got to have the political will -- a broad coalition of business and labor, doctors, nurses, hospitals -- everybody standing firm when the inevitable attacks come from the insurance companies and the pharmaceutical companies that don't want to change the system because they make so much money out of it.

BLITZER: Senator Clinton, you can do that without raising taxes?

CLINTON: Well, Wolf, here's the challenge. I have put forth approximately $120 billion in savings from health care changes that can come; everything from electronic medical records to better management of chronic care. That is about in the ballpark of what all of us believe it will cost to cover everyone.

The challenge that I'm wrestling with is: How do we realize the savings? Now, I don't think there's any Democrat that is not going to let the Bush tax cuts on the wealthiest Americans expire. We're all going to do that. So that money will be available.

How, then, do we set forth the priorities that we want to address, including energy efficiency, dealing with global climate change and so much else?

BLITZER: All right. Governor Richardson, I want you to weigh in, and then I'll let Senator Dodd weigh in.

RICHARDSON: As governor of New Mexico, this is what we did.

RICHARDSON: We insured every child under 5. My wife Barbara, who sits here, led an effort in the state to increase immunizations.

We got rid of junk food in schools. We brought mandatory phys ed...

BLITZER: But can you do national health care...

RICHARDSON: Yes, yes, you can. Here's how we do it.

BLITZER: ... universal health care, without raising taxes?

RICHARDSON: Yes. This is how we do it.

Number one: My plan is mandatory. You do have everybody sharing -- the employer, the employee -- you have the state and the federal government.

Secondly, I believe that we can have a plan where, if you were satisfied with your health care plan, you can keep it. No new bureaucracies. But, in addition to that, you focus on prevention. You allow everybody to get the congressional plan that every member here has.

BLITZER: Thank you.

RICHARDSON: You bring Medicare 55 and over...

BLITZER: All right.

RICHARDSON: That's what you do.

BLITZER: Thank you, Governor.

I promised Senator Dodd he could weigh in as well.

DODD: Well, listen, this is a -- there's not a person in this audience or who's watching this program who wouldn't tell you that they've encountered the problems of the health care system in this country.

It is shameful. We rank 42nd in infant mortality in the United States worldwide. We rank 45th in life expectancy.

It is shameful that in the 21st century we have 47 million of our fellow citizens without health care coverage; 9 million children.

DODD: And the number's growing every single day.

Look, as we've said here, there's basic agreement about universality here, dealing with information technology, preventive care, chronic illnesses -- what's been missing in all of this is the ability to bring people together to get the job done.

BLITZER: All right...

DODD: That's what I've done for 26 years. That's what you need to be able to do...

BLITZER: I'm going to...

DODD: ... because no one party is going to write this whole thing. It's going to take cooperation to get it done.

BLITZER: I'm going to move onto the next question.

EDWARDS: Can I just say -- just 15 seconds on it?

BLITZER: I'll let Senator Edwards, and then, Congressman Kucinich -- I've got a specific question for Congressman Kucinich. But go ahead.

EDWARDS: OK. I'll be very quick. I think it is very important, though, to understand -- I think Senator Obama was very honest just now.

We have a threshold question about whether we're going to have truly universal care. The New Republic has estimated that his plan will leave about 15 million people uncovered. He says he will do something about that later.

I believe that unless we have a law requiring that every man, woman and child in America be covered, we're going to have millions of people who aren't covered.

EDWARDS: Secondly -- secondly -- all the savings that Senator Clinton just talked about are in my plan, and they're in Senator Obama's plan.

And both of us have recognized that it's going to cost significant money and we've talked about how we're going to pay for it.

BLITZER: Senator Obama?

OBAMA: Wolf, since John referred to me, I agree with him on the second point, which is, we've got these savings and we're still going to have to do a little bit more, partly because you've got to invest up front in, for example, information technology, so that rural hospitals that don't have computers are able to buy them -- and they're going to need some help.

But on this issue of mandatory versus nonmandatory (OFF-MIKE) going around trying to avoid buying health care coverage. And, in fact, if you look at auto insurance, in California, there's mandatory auto insurance -- 25 percent of the folks don't have it. The reason is because they can't afford it.

OBAMA: So John and I, we're not that different in this sense, that I am committed to starting the process. Everybody who wants it can buy it and it is affordable.

If we have some gaps remaining, we will work on that. You take it from the opposite direction, but you're still going to have some folks who aren't insured under your plan, John, because some of them will simply not be able to afford to buy the coverage that they were offered.

EDWARDS: Children cannot make that decision.

OBAMA: And that's why I've got mandatory...

EDWARDS: The decision he is talking about people making cannot be made by children, and that's why you have to require that they be covered.

OBAMA: John, I've got mandatory insurance for children for exactly that reason.

BLITZER: Hold on one second. I promised Congressman Kucinich...

KUCINICH: I reject this whole approach.

And the American people should know that with half the bankruptcies in the country connected to people not being able to pay their doctor bills or hospital bills, premiums, co-pays and deductibles are going so far through the roof, 46 million Americans with no health care, another 50 million underinsured, there is only one way to get health care coverage for all Americans. And that is to have a universal, single-payer, not-for-profit health care system, Medicare for all.

Wolf, I have written the bill. It is H.R. 676, with John Conyers, supported by 14,000 physicians.

KUCINICH: And you know what? What Senator Clinton, Senator Edwards, Senator Obama are talking about, they're talking about letting the insurance companies stay in charge. They're talking about continuing a for-profit health care system. And I think...

BLITZER: All right, hold on...

(APPLAUSE)

KUCINICH: ... we need a president who is ready to challenge that.

(APPLAUSE)

And I'm ready to challenge the insurance companies.

BLITZER: All right, let's go to the next question.

Tom?

FAHEY: Let's try this now.

(LAUGHTER)

This is my voice.

Senator Clinton, you've said that it's time to allow gays and lesbians to serve openly in the U.S. military and end the "don't ask/don't tell" policy that was implemented when your husband was president.

Was President Clinton's policy of "don't ask/don't tell" a mistake?

CLINTON: It was a transition policy and it was an effort to try to deal with the reality that -- probably since the very beginning of our nation we've had gays serving in our military with distinction and honor on behalf of our country, as we do today.

CLINTON: And yet I have watched how "don't ask/don't tell" has been implemented. And I've concluded that it is not the best way for us as a nation to proceed.

It has been in many instances implemented in a discriminatory manner. You know, after the first Gulf War there was a big flood of discharges of gays and lesbians because they let them serve and then after they finished the war, then they discharged them.

In this particular time period, we've had Arabic linguists discharged under "don't ask/don't tell" when we are unfortunately so short of having people who speak the very language that our men and women in uniform have to understand in the streets of Baghdad.

So I believe we could change the policy to let gays and lesbians serve in the military and be covered by the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

CLINTON: So just like those who are not gays and lesbians, if there were conduct problems, then the conduct problems we looked at. But people would not be judged on who they are.

BLITZER: All right.

CLINTON: And I just want to end by saying Barry Goldwater once said you don't have to be straight to shoot straight. And I think he was right.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: And I believe we should open up our military.

BLITZER: Senator Clinton, the question was: Was your husband's decision to allow this "don't ask/don't tell" policy to go forward -- he was president of the United States; he could have changed it -- was it a mistake?

CLINTON: No, it was an important first step, Wolf. I mean, you know, there's a certain -- I want to go back to my friend Joe Biden...

BLITZER: All right.

CLINTON: Because he's been around longer than any of us have in the Congress.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: And you know, talking -- he's a young man. He started young. But talking about this as though there is a reality out there that a president or a Congress can change with a snap of a finger does a grave disservice to the American people.

We have a political process. There are checks and balances. And Joe remembers very well, the Congress was adamantly opposed at the time to letting gays and lesbians serve openly.

CLINTON: "Don't ask/don't tell" was the compromise policy.

BLITZER: But you know, Senator Biden, there are still a lot of military commanders out there, including the current chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Peter Pace, who say keep the current policy, "don't ask/don't tell," it would be demoralizing, it would be bad for military readiness to change that policy and let gays and lesbians serve openly in the U.S. military.

BIDEN: Peter Pace is flat wrong. I've been to Afghanistan, I've been to Iraq seven times, I've been in the Balkans, I've been in these foxholes with these kids, literally in bunkers with them.

Let me tell you something: Nobody asked anybody else whether they're gay in those holes, those foxholes, number one.

Number two, our allies, the British, the French, all our major allies, gays openly serve.

I don't know the last time an American soldier said to a backup from a Brit, "Hey, by the way, let me check, are you gay, you straight?"

This is ridiculous.

And by the way, we got a war on our hands we're trying to end. In the meantime, we're breaking the military. Nine thousand of these people have been kicked out.

BLITZER: Senator?

BIDEN: This is not a rational policy.

BLITZER: Let me just do a show of hands. If you think it's time to get rid of the "don't ask/don't tell" policy in the U.S. military, raise you hands.

(APPLAUSE)

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: All of you agree on this.

Governor Richardson, go ahead.

RICHARDSON: I love all this parsing and senatorial courtesy and "on the one hand, on the other hand."

Here's what I would do. I would do what I did as governor of New Mexico. One, I would move in the Congress for a hate crimes law. I would have domestic partnerships. I would have civil unions. I would initiate laws that practice nondiscrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

I would get rid of "don't ask/don't tell." I voted against it as a congressman.

A president has to show leadership. And this country should not be asking a person who is giving up their life for this country and the military should not...

BLITZER: Thank you, Governor.

RICHARDSON: ... should not giving lecture on sexual orientation.

BLITZER: Senator Edwards, I want you to weigh in on a related question. The governor of New Hampshire is here with us tonight. He just signed legislation into law in this state allowing civil unions.

BLITZER: There are...

(APPLAUSE)

All right. Let's try to keep the applause down.

The question is this: Is it time to move beyond that and let gays and lesbians get married?

EDWARDS: Well, first of all, I think what the governor did and what New Hampshire's done is a great example for the rest of the country. Not only civil unions, but all the partnership benefits, including, Senator Clinton talked about getting rid of this "don't ask/don't tell" policy.

I don't think the federal government has a role in telling either states or religious institutions, churches, what marriages they can bless and can't bless. I think the state of New Hampshire ought to be able to make that decision for itself, like every other state in the country. I think every church ought to be able to make that decision for itself.

And I think it's very important that we stand up against intolerance and against discrimination.

But I want to add one thing on something that Governor Richardson said, because it's been a tone of everything that's been discussed here today. The place that I differ with Senator Biden, Senator Clinton, and I guess, to some extent, Senator Obama, and I agree with Governor Richardson -- it is the job of the president of the United States not to legislate but to lead.

BLITZER: All right.

EDWARDS: And voters need to ask themselves who's most likely to end the war in Iraq; who's most likely to lead on health care...

BLITZER: All right...

EDWARDS: ... who's most likely to lead on immigration, which is what you just asked about.

BLITZER: All right. We've got to move on to the next question. Let me throw it back to Scott.

SPRADLING: Senator Gravel, if you are elected president, how if at all would you use former president Bill Clinton in your administration?

(LAUGHTER)

GRAVEL: How would I use him?

Well, I'd send him as a roving ambassador around the world. He'd be good. He could take his wife with him, who will still be in the Senate.

(LAUGHTER)

... and -- but, you know -- but I'd be careful with the president, former president, because I know he wimped out with respect to gays in the military.

I'd only wished that he had been like Harry Truman who stood up to Omar Bradley when he integrated the services, which made possible for Colin Powell to now stare down the president of the United States when the president should have demanded immediate integration.

GRAVEL: That's what can we do.

But under supervision, I think he'll do OK.

(APPLAUSE)

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Governor Richardson, if you were president of the United States, the question is, what would you do with former President Bill Clinton?

(LAUGHTER)

RICHARDSON: Well, the ideal job for President Clinton would be secretary general of the United States. But that's probably not doable.

What I would do is -- President Clinton gave me, although I don't think he's very happy with me now -- President Clinton gave me two great jobs. He gave me ambassador to the United Nations, secretary of energy.

RICHARDSON: I believe he is needed in the Middle East. This administration has not had a Middle East peace envoy as other bipartisan administrations have had.

We have serious problems in the Middle East. Our great ally Israel, which I think needs buttressing, right now is less safe than it was when President Bush came in.

We need a constant Middle East peace process. President Clinton gave me two good jobs. I want to pay him back and make a Middle East peace envoy.

BLITZER: What about you, Senator Obama?

Arguably, Bill Clinton might be the most popular Democrat out there among Democrats. If you were elected president, what would you have him do?

OBAMA: Well, I think both answers reflect one of the former president's enormous strengths. And that was his capacity to build alliances and relationships around the world. And I have no doubt that Hillary played an enormous role in helping that happen.

But what we've seen over the last six years is the effort to replace bluster and belligerence and saber-rattling for solid diplomacy and strategy and foresight.

OBAMA: One of the things that we're going to have to do is to return to that recognition that we can't simply lead with our military. The strength of our military has to be matched with the power of our diplomacy, the strength of our alliances.

That's how we are going to deal with the crisis in the Middle East. That's how we're going to end a genocide in Darfur, and I think that President Clinton's vision of our interdependence globally is something, and obviously Senator Clinton may have something to say about how I use Bill Clinton, so in fairness she should be able to respond.

BLITZER: Let her tell us -- if you were president, Senator Clinton, what would your husband do?

CLINTON: This is a fascinating question.

CLINTON: They asked the Republicans, they asked the Democrats. And I think from -- respective (ph) of what you've already heard, I believe in using former presidents.

I think we should have everybody helping us to repair the damage of the last, by then, eight years. And when I...

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: ... when I become president, Bill Clinton, my dear husband, will be one of the people who will be sent around the world as a roving ambassador to make it very clear to the rest of the world that we're back to a policy of reaching out and working and trying to make friends and allies and stopping the alienation of the rest of the world.

There's not a problem we face, from global terrorism to global warming or HIV/AIDS or bird flu or tuberculosis...

BLITZER: All right.

CLINTON: ... where we don't need friends and allies.

BLITZER: Thank you.

CLINTON: And he would be a tremendous help in our country's effort to redo that again.

BLITZER: Thank you, Senator.

Let's go back to Scott for another question.

SPRADLING: Thanks, Wolf.

Senator Dodd, gas prices are at record high levels. Granite Staters are frustrated. Americans are frustrated. What would you do to reduce gas prices?

DODD: Well, this is a major crisis issue, obviously. Energy, related problems, obviously, problems with global warming, the dependency on the Middle East for so much of our energy supplies.

DODD: It's a national security issue. It's a health care issue.

The problems are profound here and require some very strong answers.

I also think this issue provides incredible opportunities for us to grapple with and deal with here, if we have the kind of strong leadership in the country. I believe we can make a difference here on reducing our dependency on those sources of energy while simultaneously rolling back the problems of global warming -- of global warming.

Today we have the solar -- polar caps melting, we have greenhouse gases that are accumulating at record levels way beyond expectations.

We really have the dual responsibility here of reducing the polluting effects of depending upon fossil fuels and also allowing us to develop the alternative technologies that would allow us to move beyond this issue.

DODD: I've introduced a plan here that would require a by the year 2017 50 miles per gallon standard for our automobiles. I believe that can be done. We ought to do it immediately, in my view.

And a carbon tax, in my view, so that you make the polluting dependencies, the polluting fuels, more expensive and encourage them through the use of revenues collected, to move aggressively on developing the alternative technologies of solar and wind and other sources of energy we could use.

BLITZER: Thank you, Senator, but the question is: What would you do right now to reduce the price of gasoline?

DODD: Well, what we've offered already, in fact, and that is, of course, we ought to be saying here that when the price of a barrel of oil gets beyond $40 a barrel, where there's plenty of profit here, that those dollars ought to be returned to the consumers in a rebate or plowed back into the research that would allow us to develop alternative technologies.

But the real way to get away from this here, our dependency on that kind of fuel is causing us serious problems across the board. So it isn't just a price of fuel issue here, it's also depending upon polluting technologies that are going to cost us so much.

BLITZER: Senator Gravel?

GRAVEL: Well, I join him on the carbon tax. And, of course, that will raise the price of gasoline; let's be candid about that. There's nothing I would do as president to lower the price of gasoline right now.

GRAVEL: We Americans have to grow up. If we want to get off of the dependency on the Middle East we have to own up to the problem. These things cost money. They're controlling our society.

And the sooner we stop fighting these wars -- here, stop and think: You only see $3. Just watch those wheels turn. There's another $4 -- which is what we spend to keep American troops around the world to keep the price.

So you're paying more than $7 a gallon, you just don't know it.

BLITZER: Senator Edwards?

EDWARDS: The first thing we got to do is find out what's happening with these oil and gas companies. Because we know they're making record amounts of money. We know that the same people that are refining the oil are selling it at the gas pump. So there's a huge vertical integration in this operation.

I think there ought to be an investigation of the oil and gas companies by the Justice Department. I think if the laws that presently exist don't deal with this problem and price manipulation, there should be some change in the anti-trust laws.

EDWARDS: I think we need states to enforce clean air laws against these refineries.

And then I guess last but not least in the short term -- Chris is exactly right about the things we need to be doing in the long term. But in the short term, can America finally stop spending $3 billion a year of taxpayers' money subsidizing oil and gas companies that already make billions of dollars? That's what we ought to be doing.

BLITZER: Governor Richardson, you're a former secretary of energy.

Are the oil companies -- the big oil companies engaged in price-gouging of the American consumer?

RICHARDSON: Well, I was energy secretary and my state -- we call it the Clean Energy state. We have incentives for solar, wind, biomass, biofuels. We require renewable technologies, 20 percent of our electricity.

Here's my answer: What would help in the short term, give us -- the states -- the authority to engage in serious price-gouging investigation.

RICHARDSON: That doesn't happen. But this is not the answer. The answer...

BLITZER: Do you believe they are?

RICHARDSON: No, they're not.

The answer is this. We need an Apollo program, Apollo, led by a president, asking every American to sacrifice, to conserve, that would reduce our dependence on foreign oil, which is 65 percent imported, to 10.

I have the most aggressive plan, according to the League of Conservation Voters.

BLITZER: All right.

RICHARDSON: It would go to 80 percent, 80 percent reduction in greenhouse gas emissions.

BLITZER: Thank you...

RICHARDSON: ... by the year 2040. But it takes...

BLITZER: Hold on, Governor.

RICHARDSON: ... an effort by every American.

BLITZER: I'm going to let Senator Biden weigh in as well.

What would you do specifically, Senator Biden -- give it to us briefly -- to reduce, if you want to reduce, the price of gasoline in the United States?

BIDEN: Take away the subsidy which I've introduced legislation to do. It's about $6 billion, $2.7 directly to the oil companies, number one.

Number two, investigate, as president of the United States; use the Justice Department to go in and investigate this whole issue of price-gouging.

Number three, we have to do what we all said here, but, first and foremost, significantly raise the mileage automobiles get and mandate it.

BLITZER: All right. I want everybody to stand by, because we're only getting started. We're going to continue all of this, but we're ready to shift into part two of tonight's debate, where voters from New Hampshire here will start asking specific questions. We have some work to do on the stage while we move in some of the chairs, move out the podiums.

While we watch that unfolding, you will see it, viewers of WMUR are going to go back to their studios. The rest of you are going to go and see our colleague, Anderson Cooper, and the best political team on television, who are going to give us a sense of this debate so far.

Our debate will resume here in about three minutes. We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

VAUGHN: Jenny, what is your question for the candidates tonight?

QUESTION: My question is: What is your vision on ending major military operations and how do you plan on rebuilding the military after such many years of conflict?

BLITZER: All right. Let me throw that question to Congressman Kucinich, because he's been outspoken on a lot of these issues.

KUCINICH: Thank you very much, Wolf.

First of all, thank you and your family for serving.

This country has to end its occupation of Iraq. And as I mentioned earlier, the Congress, the Democratic Congress has a very serious responsibility in this regard. We should simply not provide any bill at all. It's one thing to say you don't have the votes. It's another thing not to even offer a bill and tell the president he has the money now that's in the pipeline to bring the troops home.

KUCINICH: Now, with respect to this war, this war has degraded our service ability, and we need to have certainly a strong army, but I believe that peace is the way we reflect our strength. So I want to see an American military that will be a strong peacekeeping force, not one that is being misused, like the one in this administration -- misuses our military.

And we need a commander in chief who wants to link peace with security and who wants to see America's role working with the world community in cooperation.

BLITZER: But her question was: Specifically, what would you do to rebuild the military, which seems to be pretty stretched right now? What -- do you have a plan?

KUCINICH: Well, the first thing we need to do is cut -- first of all, there's a couple different dimension to this. One is, we need to cut military spending over all by about 25 percent. There's a lot of waste here we're talking about.

Money hasn't been focused on the troops per se. This $97 billion that went for this war isn't going to the troops. A small fraction goes to the troops.

So we need to have a strong military.

KUCINICH: We need to encourage people to be serving in our country's military, but we've got to end the United States' commitment to war as an instrument of diplomacy.

BLITZER: All right. I'm going to bring everybody in.

But, Senator Obama, you want to increase the size of the U.S. military by almost 100,000 troops. That's going to cost billions and billions of dollars.

What do you say to Congressman Kucinich, who says he wants to cut the size of the U.S. military?

OBAMA: Well, keep in mind that there's a difference between the Pentagon budget and the size of the military. So it may be that, for example, there are weapons systems that Dennis and I would agree are outmoded relics of the Cold War.

But what I want to make certain of is that our troops are not going on these repeated tours, lengthy tours, that we are providing them with all the support they need when they are on the ground, and we can't do that currently.

We also need -- and I want to make sure that this is emphasized -- that, when they come home, we are treating them with the dignity and honor that they deserve.

OBAMA: And that's something whether you were for the war or against the war, we can all agree to. And this administration has not done that because they tried to do it on the cheap.

Folks who have post-traumatic stress disorder, folks who have disability payments that are due are not getting the kinds of services they deserve. I have some specific plans to address that.

BLITZER: Senator Dodd, are there relics of the Cold War, big- ticket military items that you would cut?

DODD: Well, first of all, thank you for your service as well.

And, by the way, whatever other disagreements there are about policy, all of us here on this dais applaud immensely the work being done by our men and women in uniform. I think a round of applause for...

(APPLAUSE)

DODD: And that's the right issue, I think. We're not listening to our senior military people, by the way, who tried to engage in a transformation of our military needs here, recognizing that there are different threats we face today than we did during the Cold War.

DODD: And clearly, there needs to be a reassessment of what those priorities are, what those systems are so that we're strong enough.

We all need to say this, by the way. I think it's very, very important. No one's going to be elected president, ought to be president that's not going to have as their primary priority keeping us safe and secure. That is the principal responsibility of an American president.

BLITZER: All right.

DODD: But to do that, to do that you've also got to make sure that we're going to be prepared to use that force not as the first arrow we draw out of the quiver, but rather utilizing the other resources we have as a nation to advance our interests. That has not happened here under this administration. We need to get back to that as a nation.

BLITZER: But is there a specific military program...

DODD: Absolutely. Clearly, we've got systems here -- the F-22 we're looking at, for instance, other things that ought to be reassessed in terms of whether or not they fit into a 21st-century military needs of our nation.

BLITZER: Thank you, Senator.

Jennifer, back to you.

VAUGHN: OK, Wolf. Thank you very much.

Carol Kilminster (ph) is with us tonight.

Carol, you live in Merrimack, New Hampshire. You're a social worker. Your son is serving in Iraq.

QUESTION: That's correct.

VAUGHN: Can you tell us his name?

QUESTION: James.

VAUGHN: What is your question for the candidates tonight?

QUESTION: My question is: Why is it that veterans cannot receive medical services at the hospital of their choice?

VAUGHN: Senator Obama, let's have you answer this question. You serve on the Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

OBAMA: Well, first of all, obviously, we thank James for his service.

And I know that here in New Hampshire, as I've been traveling around, there are some deficiencies in the V.A. We don't have a full service V.A. system here so a lot of troops that have been injured are having to travel elsewhere. And that's something that I think we have to address.

There are important efficiencies that we can obtain by having a V.A. hospital system -- for example, prescription drugs.

We've talked about the price gouging that takes place in other systems, in the private health care system. The V.A. actually has done a very good job at negotiating prescription drug prices so that they're lower for V.A. veterans who are going through their system than they are if they were going through another hospital system.

OBAMA: Of course, part of that has to do with the fact that, with the Medicare prescription drug bill, for example, the Congress specifically exempted Medicare from being able to negotiate for the cheapest available price. And that was a profound mistake.

But just to make sure that you're clear, we have to a V.A. that serves everybody. And in some rural communities that don't have access to services that are -- the veterans don't have access to the services that are needed, we've got to make sure that they do have the option for a private hospital that is more -- that is closer by.

BLITZER: So what you're saying is they should be allowed -- veterans -- not just to have to go to Veteran's Affairs hospitals but to go to regular hospitals as well?

OBAMA: I think they should be able to go to -- they should be going to V.A. hospitals unless they have difficulty accessing...

BLITZER: All right.

OBAMA: ... and it places a hardship on the family. Then they should be exempt and be able to go to other hospitals.

BLITZER: Governor?

RICHARDSON: Well, I disagree. Under my health care plan, if you have served this country -- enlisted, a veteran -- I would give you under my health care plan, your husband, a hero's health card so that your husband could get health care anywhere they want, with any doctor, with any hospital.

(APPLAUSE)

Our system right now, our V.A. system, is good, but we have to offer our veterans that choice. Some have to go 150 miles, especially in rural areas.

I would also do something else in terms of veterans health care. What we have in our V.A. system is cost-of-living increases for other benefits, but not for V.A. health care. And today a lot of our vets coming back from Iraq and Afghanistan, PTSD, mental health. We cannot do enough to help them. And it's critically important that we have a well-funded V.A. system.

BLITZER: All right.

RICHARDSON: As president, I would make sure that the V.A. health system is funded and we say thanks to those that have served our country.

BLITZER: Thank you, Governor.

Senator Gravel, you served in the military during the Korean War. Have you had any experiences with the Veterans Affairs Department as a veteran yourself?

GRAVEL: I get my meds from the V.A., so I know the situation quite well.

BLITZER: Are you satisfied or unsatisfied?

GRAVEL: I'm satisfied, very much so. I think they do a good job. But I think it is really somewhat appalling because the government has always, always waged war against the veterans.

I would suggest that Senator Obama, who's on the committee -- did they do any oversight work to find out before they read in The Washington Post that there was a scandal up the street at Walter Reed? I mean, what about that? Did they all get informed of that, or did you know it before?

OBAMA: Actually, we have done a lot of oversight trying to consistently force this administration to put money into the system that it has refused.

(CROSSTALK)

OBAMA: Let me finish, Mike.

The first year that I was on the V.A., myself, Senator Patty Murray, Senator Rockefeller and others tried to tell the administration you need an additional $2 billion in order to provide services to troops who were coming home.

The administration said, "No, you don't need it. We don't need it. Everything's covered."

Six months through, they had to come back and say, "You know what? It turns out we did need it after all."

And part of the reason is because they have been trying to keep the costs down of this war and have not fully factored in the sacred obligation that I think we have to make sure that every single veteran has the services that they need.

BLITZER: But the question he asked specifically was, did you know about the problems at Walter Reed...

OBAMA: No.

BLITZER: ... before you read about them in The Washington Post?

OBAMA: No, we didn't. And I visited Walter Reed repeatedly.

Typically, what would happen is we would go to visit troops in the medical facility.

OBAMA: And people will acknowledge that the medical facility at Walter Reed does great work. Unfortunately, what it turned out was the outpatient facilities were disastrous. And that's why we now have legislation moving forward to make sure not only that we're just painting over some of the mold that was in there. But we're also making it easier for families and veterans to negotiate the system once they're outpatients.

BLITZER: All right.

Let's go back to Jennifer for another question.

VAUGHN: Wolf, thank you.

Hi, Polly (ph). You live in Hancock, New Hampshire. You're a retired legal secretary.

You have a question about Iran tonight. You lived there in the late '60s.

QUESTION: Yes. That's particularly the reason why I have the question about Iran.

I'd like to ask: How would you approach solving the problem we have Iran today? Would you use force or would you use diplomacy? And if you used diplomacy, what would you do?

BLITZER: All right, let's let Senator Clinton first respond to that.

CLINTON: Well, I am very concerned about Iran. And I believe that we should have been using diplomacy for a number of years now.

CLINTON: I am, I guess, pleased that the administration is starting to talk to the Iranians, but it is way overdue. We have allowed the Iranians to begin their nuclear program, to imprison Iranian Americans as they are now, to send weapons across their borders to be used against our young men and women.

And we need a process of engagement. You know, the president's policy has been, we don't talk in this administration to people we don't agree with or that we think are bad. All during the Cold War, we always talked to the Soviet Union.

They had missiles pointed at us. They had leaders who said they would bury us. They waged wars around the world. We never stopped talking.

In my administration, diplomacy, patient, careful diplomacy, the kind of diplomacy that Bill Richardson did for my husband, that really gets people to stay with it over time.

CLINTON: Are you always going to get good results? No. But you've got to start the process.

However, we still have to make it clear that Iran having a nuclear weapon is absolutely unacceptable. We have to try to prevent that at all costs.

(APPLAUSE)

But we need to start with diplomacy in order to see what we can accomplish.

BLITZER: So what happens, Senator, if diplomacy, when all is said and done, fails?

CLINTON: Wolf, I'm not going to get into hypotheticals, because we've had an administration that doesn't believe in diplomacy. You know, they have every so often Condi

Rice go around the world and show up some where and make a speech, and occasionally they even send Dick Cheney -- and that's hardly diplomatic in my view.

So from what I...

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

We won't know until we get a president who is committed to diplomacy and will do things like use the great diplomats that have come up through our country -- use former presidents, use people like Bill Richardson. Only then will we be able to make a clear assessment.

I just hope we have enough time. Because, unfortunately, we have many months to go before this administration is done.

BLITZER: Senator Edwards, how far would you go, if necessary, to stop Iran from building a nuclear bomb?

EDWARDS: Well, let me -- can I be more specific?

I think that, beyond just talking about diplomacy, if you lived in Iran, you know that the Iranian people actually rallied for America on the streets of Tehran, after September the 11th.

And there's a long history of pro-American sentiment in Iran. There is an extraordinary opportunity available to us on Iran. And there's a very clear path, from my perspective.

They have a president who's politically unpopular. The people are in a different place. He hasn't done what he promised to do, Ahmadinejad, when he was elected president.

We don't have economic leverage over the Iranians. But the Europeans do. The European banking system does. We should put two options on the table. One, carrots: we'll make the nuclear fuel available to you, the international community, but we'll control it; you can't nuclearize -- you can't weaponize it.

Second, we're going to put a clear set of economic incentives on the table.

EDWARDS: And the Iranian people need to hear this.

BLITZER: All right.

EDWARDS: It needs to be not behind closed doors.

Just 10 more seconds.

And then the alternative -- the stick -- is if they don't do that, there are going to be serious economic sanctions.

We need to drive a wedge between the Iranian people and this radical leader.

BLITZER: But you're saying only economic sanctions, not a military threat that should be on the table. Is that what you're saying?

EDWARDS: I think this is the clear path. I think no president -- no responsible president -- would ever take any option off the table.

BLITZER: What about that, Senator Biden? You're the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. If you got word from the U.S. intelligence community that Ahmadinejad and his government were on the verge of having a nuclear bomb capable of hitting targets in the region on missiles, what would you do?

BIDEN: Well, first of all, I would do away with the policy of regime change. What we're saying to everybody in Iran is: Look, by the way, give up the one thing that keeps us from attacking you and after that we're going to attack you, we're going to take you down.

It's a bizarre notion, number one.

BIDEN: Number two, understand how weak Iran is. They are not a year away or two years away. They are a decade away from being able to weaponize with exactly what the question was, if they put a nuclear weapon on top of a missile that can strike. They are far away from that.

Number three, in fact, we have to understand how weak that government is. They import almost all of their refined oil. By 2014, they are going to be importing their crude oil. There are much better ways if we had to get to the point of real sanctions of doing economic sanctions on them forcefully that way. But at the end of the day, if they posed a missile, stuck it on a pad, I'd take it out.

BLITZER: Senator, thank you for that.

Let's go back to Jennifer.

VAUGHN: OK, well, thank you.

Matthew Mazer (ph), how are you?

QUESTION: Fine, thank you.

VAUGHN: You're faculty here.

QUESTION: Yeah, I'm a professor of history.

VAUGHN: And you live in Concord, New Hampshire?

QUESTION: I do.

VAUGHN: What is your question tonight?

QUESTION: A number of the candidates have talked about alliance- building. I want to ask about a specific country. The U.S. has had close relations with Pakistan as part of the war in Afghanistan and part of the war on terror.

QUESTION: How do you reconcile our security interests with Pakistan with our interest in promoting liberal democracy? Pakistan is not a democratic country.

BLITZER: Let's ask -- let's throw that question to Senator Clinton.

CLINTON: Well, it's a really important question, because we have been supporting Pakistan through President Musharraf now for a number of years. And it is clear that he has not moved toward democracy, but has solidified his rule and become quite anti-democratic, with his removal of the chief justice and many of the other moves that he's taken.

At the same time, we depend upon him to try to control the tribal areas out of which come the resurgent Taliban and Al Qaida fighters who cross the border into Afghanistan.

Again, this is an area where I think the United States needs to be just focused, like the proverbial laser.

When I was in Pakistan and Afghanistan in January, I met with both President Karzai and President Musharraf.

CLINTON: And I asked them if it would help to have a high-level presidential envoy working with both of them to try to figure out how we can move toward what are American interests and how we can keep Pakistan from undermining the war against the Taliban and Al Qaida.

BLITZER: All right.

CLINTON: And unfortunately when I got back and I called the White House and I made this suggestion, it fell on deaf ears.

So there's a lot we need to do. And it's a very difficult, thorny problem how to address it.

BLITZER: Congressman Kucinich, if you were president of the United States and the intelligence community said to you, "We know where Osama bin Laden is. He's in Pakistan. We've got the specific target. But he's only going to be there for 20 minutes," you've got to give the order yes or no to take him out with a Hellfire missile, but it's going to kill some innocent civilians at the same time: What would be your decision?

KUCINICH: I don't think that a president of the United States who believes in peace and who wants to create peace in the world is going to be using assassination as a tool.

KUCINICH: Because when you do that, it comes back at your country. And I think that Osama bin Laden, if he's still alive, ought to be held to account in an international court of law. And so should any other person who's been involved in a violation of international law which has resulted in the deaths of many people.

And so, I think that an America which has a strong stand morally in the world is an America that shows a way to get to peace. And an America that stands for peace is a strong country. So I would say to answer that question, I don't believe in assassination politics, and when you do that, you inevitably bring the assassination of our own leaders into play.

BLITZER: All right.

Senator Obama, you want to respond?

OBAMA: Well, I think Dennis is right. I don't believe in assassinations, but Osama bin Laden has declared war on us, killed 3,000 people, and under existing law, including international law, when you've got a military target like bin Laden, you take him out.

OBAMA: And if you have 20 minutes, you do it swiftly and surely.

And it's unfortunate that I think during the initial push into Afghanistan that we let him slip away because we were distracted.

One thing that I want to talk about with respect to both Pakistan and the various problems in the region, including Iran: Our presence in Iraq is weakening our capacity to deal with these issues and fanning anti-American sentiment in such a way that it makes it more difficult for Musharraf to work with us effectively.

If people in Pakistan believe that the U.S. is an occupying force, it makes us more subject to the kinds of difficulties that we're seeing in Pakistan today.

BLITZER: I want everybody to raise their hand and tell me: If you agree that if the U.S. had intelligence that could take out Osama bin Laden and kill him, even though some innocent civilians would die in the process, would you, as president, authorize such an operation?

BLITZER: If you would, raise your hand.

BIDEN: It would depend on how many innocent civilians...

CLINTON: Yes, I mean, part of this is one of these hypotheticals, Wolf...

EDWARDS: There's not information, not enough information.

CLINTON: ... that is very difficult to answer in the abstract.

You know, my husband actually tried to take out bin Laden. You know, he did fire missiles at a training camp that we had intelligence that that's where bin Laden was.

Because, by that time, bin Laden had already bombed our embassies; bin Laden had already demonstrated his hostility toward the United States.

But you can't just -- you have to be very careful about how you proceed.

So, you know, yes, if we could do it without a tremendous amount of collateral damage, I think, maybe with one or two exceptions, we would give the order to do it, knowing what a weighty responsibility that is.

BLITZER: All right. We're going to go on to the next question, from Jennifer.

Senator Edwards, you really want to weigh in.

EDWARDS: I just wanted to answer the original question that was asked, which was, how do you reconcile Musharraf being in power with our ideas of a liberal democracy?

And I think one of the things we have seen, during the course of the Bush administration, is America is not for any possible kind of democracy, we're for democracies that respect the rights of minorities, that actually respect civil rights and individual liberties.

EDWARDS: And one danger that anyone has to recognize with the possible taking down of Musharraf as the president of Pakistan -- and I met with him also in Islamabad a few years ago -- one of the things we have to recognize is if he goes out of power, given the power of radical Islam in Pakistan, there's absolutely no way to know what kind of government will take its place.

BLITZER: And Pakistan's a nuclear power also.

Jennifer, go ahead.

VAUGHN: Jeff Turiel (ph) is here with us tonight.

You are a psychologist at Nashua High School. Would that be Nashua North?

QUESTION: Nashua North; that's correct.

VAUGHN: What's your question tonight?

QUESTION: I would like to address the crisis in Darfur. At this time, as many as 400,000 people have been killed, millions or more are without food and shelter. If you were elected president, would role do you think the United States should play in addressing this terrible tragedy?

BIDEN: Wolf?

BLITZER: Yes?

BIDEN: I just was there.

BLITZER: Go ahead, Senator.

BIDEN: You know, we have to stop talking about it. A lot of talk goes on about it. The United Nations has already said they're prepared to put in a 21,000 force, including the African Union.

BIDEN: In fact, you have in the capital of Sudan the government saying, "We're not going to allow that to happen." They have forfeited their sovereignty by engaging in genocide.

We should impose a no-fly zone if the U.N. will not move now. We should impose a no-fly zone, and we should commit 25,000 -- 2,500 NATO troops. You could take out the Janjaweed tomorrow.

I went there. I sat in the borders. I went in those camps. They're going to have thousands and thousands and thousands of people die. We've got to stop talking and act.

BLITZER: All right.

BIDEN: That's why last Monday I went to see the president of the United Nations at the General Assembly, as well as the secretary general, to make that point.

BLITZER: Raise your hand if you agree with Senator Biden that the United States should use military force to stop the genocide in Darfur.

CLINTON: Are we talking about a no-fly zone...

EDWARDS: Wolf...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: Hold on. Hold on.

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: This is an important issue. This is an important issue.

(CROSSTALK)

CLINTON: Absolutely...

EDWARDS: Because you're talking about American troops.

CLINTON: ... an apology.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: ... no-fly zone, but very often, Senator Clinton, that could move on to other operations.

CLINTON: Well, but, we're not going to engage in these hypotheticals. I mean, one of the jobs of a president is being very reasoned in approaching these issues. And I don't think it's useful to be talking in these kind of abstract, hypothetical terms.

RICHARDSON: Well, I was there...

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: I think that's...

RICHARDSON: But I was there.

BLITZER: Governor, would you use force to save people in Darfur?

RICHARDSON: No, what I would do -- and I was there. I got a very fragile cease-fire put together there, three months ago.

And we made things a little better. I want with the Save Darfur Coalition.

This is what I would do. Number one, more U.N. peacekeepers. The government is refusing to make this happen.

Secondly, economic sanctions. We've imposed them, but they're weak. We need European countries to make them happen.

RICHARDSON: Third, we need China, to lean on China, which has enormous leverage over Darfur. And if the Chinese don't want to do this, we say to them, maybe we won't go to the Olympics. And lastly, what we need is a country, a foreign policy that cares about Africa, that cares that 300,000 human beings have died, have been massacred, that over 2 million have lost their homes.

BLITZER: All right.

RICHARDSON: Gender-based violence, rape. America should care about Africa, and we don't.

(CROSSTALK)

(APPLAUSE)

BLITZER: Hold on one second. What about that idea, Senator Dodd, about possibly boycotting the Beijing Summer Olympic games if China doesn't use its influence to stop the genocide in Sudan?

DODD: I think that goes too far, Wolf. Here, look. This is a major issue.

DODD: There are ways of dealing with this. We're not only going to elect a president in November of 2008. We're going to elect, arguably, the most important, if not the most important, leader in the world.

And it's going to be critically important that we use the tools available to us to exercise the influence we'd like on China, on Russia and other nations to be more cooperative and participate in solving some of these problems here.

That's going to require real leadership based on experience that knows how to bring people together -- certainly, reminding the Chinese of the importance of this issue -- utilizing those tools that are available to us.

But the idea that you go in and stop the Olympics from happening I don't think gets you there. I think that's more likely to delay the kind of influence and support China ought to be providing.

BLITZER: Senator Edwards?

EDWARDS: Actually, I disagree with my friend, Chris Dodd, about that. I think that we should use whatever tools available to us.

And I have to say to Senator Biden, Governor Richardson, I applaud their being so vocal and out there on this issue. It's enormously important.

But I think all of us recognize that this is a piece of a bigger puzzle, which is America no longer has the moral authority to lead in the world.

EDWARDS: Watching a genocide continue has contributed to that, but it is not the only thing. The spread of HIV/AIDS, I think America ought to actually lead an effort to make primary school education available to 100 million children in the world who desperately need it, including in Africa...

BLITZER: We're going to go back to Jennifer.

But go ahead, Senator Obama, very quickly.

OBAMA: Two things -- one, we are going to continue to see some of these problems in ungoverned spaces. We've got a security interest and a humanitarian interest in dealing with this. We've got to work internationally to figure out how we can get forces to stop genocides like this.

Second point, our legitimacy is reduced when we've got a Guantanamo that is open, when we suspend habeas corpus. Those kinds of things erode our moral claims that we are acting on behalf of broader universal principles, and that's one of the reasons why those kinds of issues are so important.

(CROSSTALK)

DODD: ... cancel the Olympics.

DODD: That's not a bad question. You asked the question.

(CROSSTALK)

DODD: I'd like to know how my colleagues would feel about it.

BLITZER: If you agree that the U.S. should consider boycotting Asian Olympics...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: Senator Dodd says he doesn't think that's a good idea. If you agree that it might be a good idea, raise your hand -- if necessary.

BIDEN: Wolf, the reason we have no moral authority is we're not acting. I heard the same argument with Milosevic. I went over there, found out there was genocide going on, came to your husband. I said, "We must act."

Now, look, we acted. Not an American was killed. We saved hundreds of thousands of lives.

By the time all these guys talk, 50,000 more people are going to be dead. They're going to be dead. And I tell you, I guarantee you, we have the capacity by setting up a no-fly zone to shut down the Janjaweed. That's our moral authority. Exercise it.

(APPLAUSE)

OBAMA: Nobody disagrees with the no-fly zone...

BLITZER: I want to go back to Jennifer, but I have to ask Governor Richardson, you're a former ambassador at the United Nations, and what I hear you saying, what you're saying is that you would consider the United States boycotting the Summer Olympic Games in China unless China starts getting tough with the government in Sudan.

RICHARDSON: Yes, I would. Because China purchases a lot of their oil -- most of it, a good part of it -- from Sudan.

And my view is that they are a leverage point. And they have not been strong on the Sudan.

We don't need, Joe -- with all due respect -- another military involvement. Iraq is enough. And we must get out of Iraq.

What we need to do is move forward with the toughest options. Am I for a no-fly zone? Yes. I think we need strong economic sanctions. And we lack the moral authority to build international coalitions, to fight genocide in Darfur. We should shut down -- I would as first day as president, I would shut down Guantanamo. I would shut down Abu Ghraib and secret prisons. That is the moral authority that we don't have.

BLITZER: Hold on one second.

The audience is anxious for another question from out here.

Jennifer?

VAUGHN: Tim O'Connor is anxious.

VAUGHN: You're about to graduate from high school.

QUESTION: Yeah.

VAUGHN: Are you eligible, now, to vote, for the first time, in the New Hampshire primary?

QUESTION: I am. I'm 18 now.

VAUGHN: What's your question tonight?

QUESTION: Well, on a little bit lighter note, I spent last summer in Germany with a family whose oldest son was completing his one-year mandatory service to his country.

I was wondering if you think we should have that; and if so, how you plan to make it happen?

BLITZER: All right.

Senator Gravel, let me ask you that question.

GRAVEL: And obviously, I filibustered to force the end of the draft. I don't think we need it back.

If you want to volunteer for the military, you're entitled to do it.

I would like to see a voluntary program where young people would have an opportunity to render public service, whether it's in the military, whether it's the Peace Corps, whether it's the AmeriCorps, or all of the above; and therefore, every year that you serve, we'll give you four years of school free.

(APPLAUSE)

That will give you an incentive to move forward and do something about education in this country.

BLITZER: Congressman Kucinich, should there be mandatory service for young people after they finish high school?

KUCINICH: I would take the approach that John F. Kennedy took when he said, "Ask not what your country can do for you. Ask what you can do for your country," and inspire young people to want to serve.

And want to serve not only in the military, which is honorable service, but also to serve in helping to clean up our environment. Also to serve in tutoring children and helping the elderly and working in hospitals.

There are so many different ways that we can encourage you to serve. To make it mandatory loses the point. People want to love America again. And when you have a president who will inspire the young people, they'll want to get involved.

BLITZER: Is it time, Senator Dodd, as Congressman Charlie Rangel recommends, to bring back the military draft?

DODD: I don't think so, Wolf, at all. I served as a Peace Corps volunteer back in the 1960s, an American -- of course, I've been asked a million times why did I join the Peace Corps. And I did so because an American president asked me to. He asked a generation of us to be part of something larger than ourselves.

DODD: Some went off to join Vista; some got out into the civil rights movement; others went into the military; others went to the Justice Department. It was a very exciting time to be alive.

But today, in the world we're living in today, I don't think we need to go a draft at all. We don't need the numbers of people in the service.

But I like the idea, what we've tried to do with AmeriCorps and other things, to provide the kind of financial relief.

This young man is finishing high school. He's assumably going to go on to higher education.

I hope you are.

Looking at the staggering costs, the ripoffs that are occurring with people manipulating through deceit and fraud the student loan programs, I'd like to see us offer some real opportunities to you financially to give something back to your country. In return, we make it possible for you to get that higher education without incurring a lifetime of debt. That would be a valuable way of doing it in my opinion.

(APPLAUSE)

BLITZER: Thank you, Senator.

Jennifer, go ahead with the next question.

VAUGHN: What is your question?

QUESTION: Well, good evening, everyone.

My wife and I have two daughters, middle school age. And we do reasonably well financially, but the vast majority of our spare income goes toward funding our retirement, putting aside money for their college education.

QUESTION: And we don't have tax shelters.

We hear an awful lot about new spending -- all wonderful-sounding programs -- with the answer for funding being elimination of tax cuts that were geared toward the rich.

And I was wondering what the definition of rich is on the part of the candidates, but using, perhaps, an income level.

BLITZER: Senator Obama, what is a definition of rich?

OBAMA: Well, the definition that I'm using with respect to paying for my health care plan is those making over $250,000 a year.

Keep in mind that all we're talking about is going back to the tax levels, the marginal tax rates that existed when Bill Clinton was in office. So we're not talking about going back to huge marginal rates.

OBAMA: But you tell a larger story that I hear as I travel all across the country. And that is that folks are feeling hit from all sides. They're trying to save for the next generation's education. They're trying to save for their own retirement. In some cases, they're looking after an aging parent. Gas prices are hitting them.

And one of the things that we've seen in our economy is that the burdens and benefits of this new global economy are not being spread evenly across the board. And that's why as the next president, one of my first priorities is to make sure that we institute some fairness in the system. We institute in our tax code.

BLITZER: All right.

OBAMA: We institute it with respect to making sure that Social Security is preserved.

We institute it in giving working people an opportunity to save where they don't have it right now.

OBAMA: And we make sure that, as Chris said -- I think Chris made an excellent point -- that college education is simply too expensive at this point.

BLITZER: So give us a number, Senator Obama. At what number would you tell us that there is lower taxes, at what number people can afford higher taxes?

OBAMA: I'm sorry. I don't understand the question.

BLITZER: Income at $200,000 a year? $150,000 a year?

OBAMA: As I said before, I would roll back the Bush tax cuts for those making over $250,000. In some cases, I'd like to see lower taxes. When I was in the state legislature, one of the things that I introduced was a state earned income tax credit that provided millions of dollars of tax breaks to folks who can least afford it.

Keep in mind, my starting point is not how do I tax people. My starting point is are we spending the money that we have wisely, which we are not always doing. If you are progressive, you should be just as concerned by the huge spike in earmarks that have been taking place under the Bush administration as any so-called fiscal conservative is.

BLITZER: What is a "rich person," Senator Edwards?

EDWARDS: I don't know if I know what a rich person is. What I do for my health care plan is roll back the tax cuts for people who make over $200,000 a year.

EDWARDS: So $200,000 is the figure I use.

But I want to go to a piece of this question that you ask, which is, you talked about saving for your kids to be able to go to college. And we really haven't talked about that tonight. Just a quick idea.

College for everyone is something we've actually, Elizabeth and I, put in place in eastern North Carolina, in a small community in eastern North Carolina, and the idea is really simple. The idea is, if a kid graduates from high school qualified to be in college and they commit to work when they're there at least 10 hours a week, their tuition and books are paid for.

And the idea is, we want to make it simple for kids to go to college. They have to work for it. We don't just give it to them. And then, on top of that, so many young people are faced with this crushing burden of debt when they graduate from college. I think it's something we shouldn't just be doing -- we've done this privately in this small area of eastern North Carolina...

BLITZER: All right.

EDWARDS: ... but it's something we ought to be doing all across this country, college for everyone.

BLITZER: Thank you, Senator.

Jennifer, go ahead.

VAUGHN: This is Gregory Camann (ph), and Gregory lived in Bedford, and he used to own a hair salon. I'm going to reach around you and have you ask your question.

QUESTION: Our country's now running huge federal deficits again. I'm wondering, one, do the candidates have a problem with that? And if they do, what policies would they pursue, if they became president, to alleviate that problem?

And if you could be somewhat specific. Would you be looking for the income side, and what would those policies be, or would you be looking to the spending side, and talk a little bit about those policies. Thank you.

BLITZER: Governor Richardson?

RICHARDSON: Well, I'm a governor. I have balanced five budgets. I have to as a governor. In the Clinton administration -- I want to thank the senator for her nice words -- we had a balanced budget and created 20 million jobs. This is what I would do: $100 million from the war in Iraq spent on domestic needs.

Number two, I am for a constitutional amendment to balance the budget, a line-item veto and pay-as-you-go policies.

RICHARDSON: I would get rid of the close to $30 billion earmarks that the Congress has.

I would also get rid of corporate welfare, close to $70 billion. For instance, if you're a company, you get a tax credit -- a runaway tax credit -- to take jobs overseas.

I would also find ways to let insurance companies have cost controls, strong cost controls to reduce the deficit.

I would also take other steps and say that it is critically important that we also grow the economy. I'm a pro-growth Democrat. I believe if we grow the economy, for instance, this -- the two daughters of the young man, the young father over there. If we grow the economy 1.8 percent instead of the 1.3, the solvency of Social Security in the year 2045 would be resolved.

RICHARDSON: And I would be a president who would give incentives to companies that bring jobs over the prevailing wage, rural tax credits...

BLITZER: Thank you.

RICHARDSON: ... ways that we help the economy grow in the technology sector.

BLITZER: Thank you, Governor.

Congressman Kucinich, you know the Republicans will say what they're hearing, by and large, tonight is more Democrats suggesting raise taxes, raise spending, more of the same, the big tax, big spending party.

What do you say to them?

KUCINICH: I'm saying that we should not be borrowing money from China to run a war in Iraq. We need to change our spending policies in many ways.

First of all, stop war. Most of the people on this stage voted consistently to fund a war we should have never gotten into in the first place.

Change our trade laws. We need to get out of NAFTA and the WTO and go back to bilateral trade, conditioned on worker's rights, human rights and the environment and stop driving an $800 billion trade deficit.

We need to have health care for all, all Americans, in a not-for-profit health care system.

That's going to help the gentleman with his beauty salon and his small business, when you have a chance to have health care at a fraction of what you're paying now and everything's covered.

And then finally, environment: I say we can create millions of new jobs with a new WGA (ph), inspiring technologies for wind and solar and insulation on a domestic basis.

We can create new wealth. I want to create new wealth and I want to stop wasting the money where we're wasting it or losing the wealth in our trade policies.

BLITZER: Thank you, Congressman.

Jennifer, you have an e-mail question.

VAUGHN: Yes, Wolf, if I may. This e-mail question is from our WMUR gather.com blogger.

The question is: Democrats have vowed to weed out corruption in the federal government. A major source of corruption for both Democrats and Republicans are bribes in spending bills, sometimes referred to as earmarks.

Would you vow, if elected president, to veto all bills containing earmarks?

And, Wolf, earmarks -- the pork spending that sometimes gets added to legislation without anybody really knowing about it.

BLITZER: Well, let's ask Senator Dodd. What about that? Would you agree to give up earmarks for Connecticut if you had your way?

(LAUGHTER)

DODD: Thanks, Wolf...

(LAUGHTER)

Well, listen, first of all, as president, we ought to be discouraging that behavior, because it is a problem. Clearly, the budget is getting out of control as a result of those practices.

But I wouldn't want to have a blanket approach to that. There may be some critical issues that occur -- events like Katrina and other events -- where the Congress needs to respond, you haven't gone through the process before. I wouldn't want to put us in that kind of a rigid straitjacket.

But, clearly, when you're going beyond that, we need to have more discipline in the process.

I've been a long-time supporter -- offered the first, one of the first pay-as-you-go budgets back some 23 years ago in the United States Senate -- the question that came up earlier about specific policies and ideas.

I think, with rare exceptions you ought to be able to have accounting for either the tax cut or the spending program and pay for them.

We've gone on too long allowing for these things to build and grow, and the deficits are a problem. Dennis is right: $2.2 trillion of public debt being held outside the country.

The good news is that the Chinese are buying it. The bad news is the Chinese are buying it, because it puts us in a very disadvantageous position when it comes to arguing against currency manipulation.

So getting better control of our fiscal policies -- our fiscal policies ought to reflect our moral values. Our fiscal policies ought to be fair. They ought to be practical. They ought to be pro-growth. And they ought to be responsible.

BLITZER: Senator...

DODD: That's not happening when you have earmarks year-in and year-out and not having the kind of influence that would eliminate them except in those rare circumstances where you may need to have them.

BLITZER: Is it time to do away with these earmarks?

GRAVEL: Totally, totally. It's abominable, and the only way you're going to get rid of it is to give the president the line-item veto. Of course, they're not going to give the president a line-item veto. What we need to do is change the entire tax structure.

I want to point out that the comptroller general of the United States invited all the presidential candidates to come in for a briefing. I went in for a briefing. He said there was only two other people that came in for a briefing. What the briefing he told us is that we have a fiscal gap on the order of $50 trillion. And you're hearing all this money's going to be spent to do all these great things? My God, don't believe a word of it. Follow the money.

You can't get all this money coming at you, millions of dollars from all the special interests, and think that they're now going to deal with solving the problems with special interests. Won't happen.

BLITZER: All right.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Well, I think it's important to remember that six years ago we had a balanced budget and a surplus.

(APPLAUSE)

And we did that the old-fashioned way, by cutting spending and raising revenues. There is no free lunch. We're going to have to do that hard work again.

Now, my point is, when it comes to the tax questions that were asked, the benefits from the Bush tax cuts have gone disproportionately to a very small percentage of Americans. And 10 percent of Americans have realized about 50 percent of the increase in wealth that has happened in this country in the last six years.

We need to deal with the burden on the middle class. The alternative minimum tax has to be reformed, hopefully eventually eliminated.

But I think it's important to point out that we have done this before -- not in ancient history, but within our memory. And we can do it again once we have a Democratic president.

BLITZER: Thank you, Senator.

(APPLAUSE)

We're going to go back to Jennifer in a second. But I know Congressman Kucinich really wants to weigh in.

GRAVEL: Listen, they've been raiding the Social Security trust fund to $200 million a year, and they're all involved in this.

Now what do they say about -- you balanced the budget by raiding the Social Security fund to $200 million a year. And they're doing it now.

BLITZER: Congressman Kucinich, you want to respond to him?

KUCINICH: I do.

Because we're looking at a process here in Washington that most of the American public isn't aware of. And that is, these interest groups have such a hold on our country that right now they're headed to grab the oil of Iraq, using our troops. Right now, they're keeping a not-for-profit health-care system in its place. Right now, they're keeping NAFTA in its place. I'm talking about a real change here that gives the American people a chance to recover their country totally and by moving away from the interest groups...

BLITZER: All right.

KUCINICH: ... that unfortunately support some of my dear friends.

BLITZER: Senator Biden?

BIDEN: Ten seconds. If you want to do away with the interest groups, go to public financing of elections. Let's cut through all this malarkey.

(APPLAUSE)

BIDEN: That is the bottom line. As long as there are massive contributions pouring into the system, you're going to get these earmarks in the middle of the night that have nothing to do with the people's interest.

So you want to do this, reform the system. Make a public financing system. That will change the earmarks.

BLITZER: Thank you, Senator.

Let's go back to Jennifer.

VAUGHN: OK, Wolf.

We have Ivy Merrill with us tonight. You are a substitute elementary schoolteacher.

QUESTION: Yes, I am.

VAUGHN: What's your question tonight?

QUESTION: Well, thank you for being here.

Given that the circumstances in this country and in our world were essentially the same when you take office, what would be your top priority for your first 100 days?

BLITZER: Senator Edwards?

EDWARDS: To travel the world, re-establish America's -- I think my mike just came on -- re-establish America's moral authority in the world, which I think is absolutely crucial. The other things become less important and subservient.

We have huge issues here at home. We've talked about some of them tonight -- energy, global warming, what we do about the issue of health care in America, the poor, which we haven't talked about, unfortunately.

But, the single greatest responsibility of the next president is to travel the world, speak to the world about what real American values are -- equality, diversity -- and to lead an effort by America to re-establish our alliances around the world, which is going to require time and focus.

And then, third, to lead in taking action that demonstrates that America is strong but that America is also moral and just. And we're going to help other people in the world and we're going to demonstrate our commitment to humanity.

All those things...

BLITZER: All right.

EDWARDS: ... are crucial to re-establishing our moral authority.

BLITZER: I want to go very quickly to everyone.

What would be, Senator Clinton, your top priority in the first 100 days?

CLINTON: Well, if President Bush has not ended the war in Iraq, to bring our troops home. That would be the very first thing that I would do.

(APPLAUSE)

BLITZER: All right.

Senator Obama?

OBAMA: That would be the number one priority, assuming nothing has changed. The second priority is getting moving on health care because that's something that we can get done, I think, very quickly.

BLITZER: All right.

Governor Richardson?

RICHARDSON: Nobody's talked about your profession, education.

I would upgrade our schools. I would have preschool for every American, full-day kindergarten.

I would pay our teachers what they deserve. I'd have a minimum wage for our teachers, $40,000. I did that in New Mexico. We went from 49th to 29th.

I would bring science and math academies to get America more competitive. I would emphasize the arts. I would emphasize civics. Again, science and math.

I would have universal education...

BLITZER: Thank you.

RICHARDSON: ... available for every American.

BLITZER: Thank you, Governor.

Senator Biden, your top priority in the first 100 days?

BIDEN: I would end the war in Iraq and immediately move to defuse the possible war in Iran and immediately defuse what's going on, on the Korean Peninsula.

They're the three most important things that the next president is going to have to deal with.

And by the way, when power is handed from this president to the next, the next president is going to be left with no margin for error. They better be smarter than their advisers.

BLITZER: Congressman Kucinich, what would be your top priority?

KUCINICH: Keep in mind, we could stop that war in Iraq now by not providing any funding. But what I intend to do is to be a president who helps to reshape the world for peace -- to work with all the leaders of the world in getting rid of all nuclear weapons, rejecting policies that create war as an instrument of diplomacy, making sure that we cause the nations of the world to come together for fair trade, cancel NAFTA, cancel the WTO, go back to bilateral trade conditioned on workers rights and human rights, create a not-for-profit health care system (inaudible) a Congress.

BLITZER: Very quickly, Senator Gravel and then Senator Dodd, but very quickly: Your top priority?

GRAVEL: Top priority is to turn to these people and say they are part of the leadership right now in the Congress. They could end the war if they want to. All they've got to do is show the leadership and they will...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: Senator Dodd, very quickly. We've got five seconds.

DODD: Well, I'd kind of restore the constitutional rights in our country. This administration has done great damage to them. I would do that on the first day. I wouldn't wait 100 days on those issues.

BLITZER: We've got to leave it right there. We're going to leave it right there. This brings to an end our debate. Be sure to join us Tuesday right here on this same stage for a debate involving the Republican candidates for president of the United States.

Our next Democratic debate, by the way, will be a revolutionary approach to campaign debates. It will be held on July 23 from Charleston, South Carolina, in partnership with YouTube and Google. You're going to want to see that debate as well.
